FOREWORD

by The Rt Hon. Lord Hurd of Westwell, CH, CBE

As the wheel of history turns images familiar from the past reappear. As I write this foreword a handful of British troops are camped outside Kabul. Our newspapers day after day carry photographs of bearded warriors who rule Herat and Kandahar. Many of us have been re-reading Kim.

Behind the news of the day lie themes which go deeper than entertainment or immediate information. Successful policy making, in Asia as elsewhere, depends on informed opinion. We British have been fortunate in the last two centuries, in the number of our countrymen who have studied and travelled through Asia. To be fully valuable such experiences should be shared. That in brief was the purpose of the Royal Society for Asian Affairs when it was founded one hundred years ago. It is timely in Hugh Leach's History to remind ourselves how this came about. Then the focus was on Central Asia, but Lord Curzon quickly endorsed a wide definition of that phrase. At the Society's second Annual Dinner he said that: 'Central Asia is not merely a geographical formula, but a comprehensive phrase opening up a political problem of the first magnitude. These countries . . . form a part of what seems the most complex and intricate, and also the most important political mosaic to be seen on the face of the globe.' Few of us would write in such grandiloquent prose, but the thought remains valid, even though the Indian Empire which Curzon ruled has gone. Through the years the Society and its Journal have brought experience to bear on many of the problems which still vex us, for example Kashmir, Palestine and now again Afghanistan.

As in the past we have to wrestle not just with geographical issues, but with problems of principle. A hundred years ago a question mark began to gather over the principle of empire. Members of this Society asked what would be the outcome of the rivalries between the empires which had taken shape in the nineteenth century, and what would happen if these empires relinquished their grip. That grip was indeed relinquished in the twentieth century, but a new problem now arises. In a world of post-imperial nation states in what circumstances are more orderly and successful countries entitled to intervene when particular states decay and fail? This is the old imperial problem in a new guise. Professor Yapp told the Society nearly ten years ago 'the delusion that one can bring about a just order through international intervention in the internal affairs of states is one of the most dangerous follies of our times'. Our present Prime Minister proclaims and acts on the opposite view, both in the Balkans and in Afghanistan. History suggests that there is no absolute answer to this question. The empirical solutions on which we fall back depend on the kind of accumulated and shared wisdom of which this Society and its Journal provide such a strong example.

ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

The first shall be first and these few words are insufficient to record my debt to Sue Farrington for all her help. The book could not have been written without her and is as much hers as mine. She has typed up innumerable drafts, deciphering my dreadful hand with astonishing patience, made numerous sound suggestions and shown an uncanny and determined nose for research.

My kind neighbour, Miss Averil Hughes, has been the first to wield the 'red pen' on my initial drafts. Miss Marinel FitzSimons, MBE, has read and checked all the chapters, drawing on her retentive memory of twenty-seven years of service as Secretary to the Society. The Hon. Ivor Lucas, CMG, has laboured through the whole work, tightening it as necessary; Ms Carol Gardiner has given it the final necessary polish with her professional editing and Mrs Marilyn Hywel-Jones has helped in more ways than there is space to record. To these my especial thanks.

I am grateful for the assistance with specific chapters received from Mr Michael Pollock and Mr Murray Graham (The Library); Mr St John Armitage, CBE, the Society's acknowledged expert on matters 'Lawrentian' (The Lawrence of Arabia Medal); Dr Ina Russell, OBE, and Sir James Craig, GCMG (A Role in Education); Colonel Tony Fowle, MC, (The Dinner Club); Mr Adrian Steger (The Junior Membership); The Hon. Ivor Lucas, Ms Susan Pares and Mrs Kay Beckett (The Journal). Mr John Shipman has checked the historical accuracy of external events in the first three chapters and written that on The Archives.

Sir Denis Wright, GCMG, and Mr Michael Noël-Clark of the Iran Society have made some helpful contributions, especially relating to Sir Percy Sykes. Colonel Gordon Neilson and Mr Antony Wynn have also assisted over the Sykes material.

Personal recollections have been valued, especially from Colonel Tom Walcot for memories and a photograph of his guardian, Geoffrey Stephenson; Captain P. E. I. Bailey, RN, of his uncle Lieut Colonel F. M. Bailey; and Mr James Nash, MBE, for access to his father's papers and photographs of the Malleison Mission.

Others who have been helpful in various ways, responded to the Society's circular asking for contributions, or provided photographs include Professor Hugh Baker, Mr Jonathan Black, Mr Michael Blyth, Mr Richard Burges Watson, CMG, Mr Michael Caroe, Mrs Virginia Dimsey, Mrs Frances Dransfield, Patricia East, Lady Fenn, Mr Christopher Gibb, Mr Neville Green, OBE, Mr Peter Hopkirk, Dr Philip Horniblow, Mrs Eileen Humphreys, Ms Mishal Husain, Miss Leila Ingrams, Major Roddy Jones, Mrs Mary Mackay, Mr John Massey-Stewart, Daphne, Baroness Park of Monmouth, CMG, OBE, Mr Roger Perkins, Professor Colin Platt, Mrs Jean Rasmussen, Mrs Peggie Robertson,

ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

Mr Stephan Roman, Mr Charles Sandeman, Mrs Isobel Shaw, Colonel David Smiley, LVO, OBE, MC, Mr Tristram Sykes, Mr Ken Walton, Mr Bill Wedge, Rebecca Wilmshurst, Mr Hugh Wingfield-Hayes, Mr Francis Witts, Mrs Ingrid Woodburn, BBC World Service, Canning House, the Imperial War Museum, Jacobs Gibb Ltd, the MacRobert Trusts, the National Army Museum, the School of Oriental and African Studies, The East London Mosque Trust (Mr Chowdhury Mueen Uddin and Mr N. Haque) and Tower Hamlets Borough Local History Library (Mr Christopher Lloyd). Illustrations also come from the Society's various collections, the authors themselves and due acknowledgement is made to any others not listed individually. Similarly, whilst every effort has been made to trace, where applicable, copyright holders of photographs, apologies are made to any who might have been inadvertently omitted.

David McCarthy and his team at LaserScript have shown great ingenuity in the layout of the text and photographs and infinite patience in dealing with amendments.

I am grateful also to the Society's hard working Assistant Secretaries, Jane Young, Morven Hutchison, MBE and, previously, Yolande Whittall, who have all carried out miscellaneous areas of research for me.

There are many others who have helped but to avoid a near-endless list I ask their forgiveness by thanking them collectively for their contributions.

Above all, the Society is profoundly indebted to Shell International for their most generous contribution to aid the publication of this work.

INTRODUCTION

Whilst searching through some old boxes in the Society's offices, I came across a rather curious ink-stained note. It read: 'I was asked by General Sir Richard Gale in 1963 to write a history of the Royal Central Asian Society. Finding it impossible to do this at the same time as my Library work, I asked Sir Richard to relieve me of this task, which he did on 30 September 1964. Frank de Halpert.' As any soldier who has served under him will know, it took a brave man to stand up to the General. But de Halpert was eighty-one years old at the time and so perhaps felt seniority was on his side.

The only other archival reference to a history was made in a quip by Sir Edward MacLagan, one time President of the Royal Asiatic Society and guest speaker at the Society's Annual Dinner in 1935. He teased Sir Percy Sykes, then an Honorary Secretary, to write a poetic History of the Society. However he warned: 'It would, like Firdausi's work, have to be done in 60,000 couplets; but, if so, your Treasurer should be warned that when the poem is complete he will demand in payment an elephant with a load of 60,000 gold coins.' The Society's Treasurer may be relieved to learn that I shall lay no such demand upon him.

The Society's centenary was a milestone that inescapably demanded a history, and I was asked by the current Chairman, Sir Donald Hawley, if I would undertake the task. I agreed with some trepidation, knowing that no two people would tackle the work in the same way and that an approach that might please some would draw criticism from others. This early trepidation soon turned to a feeling of humility as I came to appreciate both the antiquity of the Society and the great men and women, statesmen, soldiers, explorers, engineers, authors and scholars, who had made up the Honorary Officers and the membership.

An outsider might conceive of a learned society dealing with Asia as being somewhat abstruse. But, as I have attempted to show, with regard to the Royal Society for Asian Affairs, nothing could be further from the truth. Its activities have negated Kipling's dictum 'East is East and West is West, And never the twain shall meet.' My aim has been to bring the Society alive, to indicate its role in Britain's imperial past and its function after that era, and to show that its tryst with Asia has been a genuine love affair.

My task has been hindered by the dearth of certain archival material which was destroyed during the 1939–1945 war. Most acute in this respect was the loss of the Society's original Golden Book, a record of its great events and office holders. For the most part I have had to rely on the minute books, until the mid-1960s mostly handwritten and not always in easily legible script, the Journals and various loose papers and documents. Some of this extant material is contradictory, especially regarding dates. But heeding the Arabic proverb 'The excuse is worse than the crime' I shall not dwell on this but rather acknowledge that any mistakes are most likely my own.

Those who look within these pages for long detailed biographies of those distinguished and colourful figures who made up the membership will be disappointed. That would require several volumes and in any case such works have already appeared both from their own pens or those of their biographers. However, there is a profusion of names and vignettes within the work, for one cannot escape the fact that any society mirrors the sum of its members. I have tried to give pen-sketches not only of the famous but also of those of similar fascination who may be less well known. I hope the reader will not find these wearisome, especially the description of the various Honorary Officers as they appear and disappear. It was their devotion and labours that enabled the Society to carry out its aims and expansions. If the memory of such as Lyall, Allenby and Wavell cannot just be hidden away in an annex, no more can that of lesser known names who served and sustained the Society equally well.

This history is written primarily for the Society's members; a different approach would be needed if it was aimed, in the first place, at an outside readership. It must, necessarily, include such prosaic happenings as changes in premises, financial crises and general statistics, otherwise it is not a referable work for future generations. The centennial history of any society inevitably reflects the political, military and social history of that century. But in order to conserve space I have assumed that most members will have a background knowledge of those Asian events covered.

The transliteration and spelling of names is a subject that raises strong passions. Here my work has been complicated by the variety of spellings used in the source material on which I have drawn. For example: Sharif, Sherif; Emir, Amir; Faisal, Feisal; Muhammad, Mohammed; Muslim, Moslem; Jiddah, Jedda; Turkistan, Turkestan; Hijaz, Hejaz, Hedjaz; and Khokand, Khokhand, Kokhand and Kokand (four variations used in one work!). I have tried to be consistent except when quoting directly from an article or speech. One may argue that there is only one correct spelling and that is in the vernacular script. My sympathies lie with those who believe that a name should appear easy on the eye and sound easy to the ear and not be spelt in accordance with some rigid rules of transcription laid down by Professors.

This book is essentially divided into three parts. The first covers the chronological history of the Society, the second embodies the membership and the third outlines its diverse activities.

What follows then is the record of the Society from its birth at the turn of the twentieth century to its centenary, from its early years of struggle when its life flickered like a candle flame in a draught to a golden period when its membership grew from a stalwart hundred to an enthusiastic near two thousand, and on to a long span post-Empire when its corporate knowledge of Asia has been available to those in need of it. As will be seen, the Society is interested in more than thirty countries, containing two thirds of the world's population, and included in its membership are not only the Presidents of four countries, three Asian and one European, and world religious leaders, but adventurers, spies even, explorers, scholars, engineers, missionaries and businessmen. It is a Society where old friends can meet and exchange memories of the Indian Frontier and lands beyond, yet listen with eager anticipation to a fresh generation which brings news of current developments in those countries to which they previously gave their working lives.

INTRODUCTION

I hope that this work will make members appreciative of the engaging origins and illustrious history of their Society and that others, now outside it, will want to ensure its equally great future by joining. Writing this Introduction in the aftermath of those cataclysmic events in the United States of America with their concomitant repercussions in Asian countries, nothing seems more pertinent to the future of this Society than the words of Sir Percy Sykes, writing in 1934: 'It only needs more members and more funds to render still more valuable service at a time when accurate information on the many complex problems of Asia is essential to the peace and progress of the world.'

GENESIS, BIRTH AND CONSOLIDATION 1901–1907

Students of history are well aware of the obscurity which veils the origins of many institutions which have made their mark on the world.

Lieut Colonel A. C. Yate, Hon. Sec., writing on the origins of the Central Asian Society in the weekly magazine
The Near East, 25 April 1919

The Pindar river drains from the southern peaks of the Nanda Devi massif in the Kumaon Himalaya and is a source of the Ganges. At its head lies the Pindari glacier, a tangle of massive ice chunks. At the 17,700 ft crest of the glacier lies Traill's Pass, so named after the first British commissioner in Kumaon, G. W. Traill, who crossed it in 1830. The pass divided the ancient kingdoms of Kumaon and Garhwal. Further north, close to the Tibetan border, lies the remote Hindu Bhotia settlement of Milam and above it a glacier of the same name which feeds the Gori Ganga river, another source of the Ganges.

It was at these two remote spots that in 1866 Alfred Cotterell Tupp first became interested in Central Asian questions. At the time of his visit Tupp would have been twenty-six and on leave from his post as Assistant Magistrate at Fatehpur in the North West Province of India. The idea of forming a Society for others interested in Central Asian subjects gestated for some thirty-four years. During this period he had collected a large library dealing with the Himalayas, Tibet, Russian and Chinese Turkestan, and Afghanistan. He had read everything relating to Central Asia that he could lay his hands on. Tupp retired from the Indian Civil Service in 1889 aged forty-nine, having served twenty-seven years, sixteen as a magistrate and judge, before entering the Financial Department. His final post was Comptroller-General to the Government of India, and in this he became known affectionately as 'Tottle it up'. In retirement Tupp saw more precisely how his ideas for such a Society might be developed. World events, especially in Tsarist Russia, had evolved dramatically since those visits to the Pindari glacier and Milam in 1866. Russia had completed her conquest of the Turkestan Khanates and had annexed most of the Pamirs, before concluding an agreement with Britain in 1895 on stopping further advance into Afghanistan.

At the turn of the century, Dr Cotterell Tupp LLD (as he now was) canvassed his friends. They were in common agreement that 'the new overland contacts between Russia, China and British India; between the civilizations of China, India, orthodox Christianity and the West; between Buddhism, Christianity, Confucianism and Islam, would have a profound effect on all the countries of Asia and the world in general. All these new contacts were by land, assisted by new railways and new roads over Central Asia.' Many of Tupp's friends, though not he himself, were members of the Royal Asiatic Society (RAS), a learned body that was precluded from discussing politics. The proposed Society would have a different remit. The problem was to find people of influence willing to support its formation.

It happened that at this time Captain Francis Younghusband, freshly returned from travels around the northern frontiers of India, in Manchuria and across China, was beginning to think along similar lines to Tupp. Younghusband had already made a reputation for himself as an explorer, and was the holder of the Royal Geographical Society's Founder's Medal. Hearing of each other's plans 'through a mutual friend', Tupp and Younghusband met briefly in February 1901 to exchange ideas. On 14 March 1901 Tupp received a letter from Younghusband saying he would be happy to join him in setting up a Society where those who had travelled in Central Asia or were interested in Central Asian questions could meet one another and discuss such subjects. During the next two weeks Younghusband called three times on Tupp at his London home at 17 Devonshire Terrace, Lancaster Gate. Shortly afterwards Younghusband left London, not returning until October of the same year when discussions between the two were resumed. They were now joined by Colonel Algernon Durand, who had made his name in the Hunza Nagar campaign of 1891, though he is better known for his book The Making of a Frontier (1900). At this point they drew up a prospectus stating the objects of the proposed Society and circulated it among a few friends who they thought might be interested. This October meeting is reckoned to mark the actual birth of the Society although its exact date has been lost to history.

Early in November a meeting was held in Captain Younghusband's house at 27 Gilbert Street, Grosvenor Square, to discuss the response to that first circular. This was attended by Tupp, Durand and General Sir Thomas Gordon, a veteran of the Indian Mutiny and Afghanistan, who had served with the Forsyth mission to Yarkand in 1873-4 and later in Persia. The four agreed there had been sufficient response to the circulation of the prospectus to distribute it more widely in printed form. It read thus:

A Proposal to Establish a Central Asian Society

At present there is in London no society or institution which is devoted entirely to the consideration of Central Asian questions from their political as well as from their geographical, commercial or scientific aspect, though Societies such as the Royal Geographical and Royal Asiatic Society discuss these subjects incidentally.

It is therefore proposed to establish a society to be called the Central Asian Society, with rooms, where those who either have travelled in Central Asia, or are interested in Central Asian questions, could meet one another. At present such persons have no recognised place of meeting or means of communication with each other, and consequently they often cease to take an active interest in the very questions to which they have previously devoted much time and attention. Those who have worked in one portion of the field will, it is thought, be glad to exchange views with others who have worked in different fields or at different times; while those who are interested in Central Asia, but have not had the opportunity of travelling, might be glad to meet those who have.

Meetings for this purpose might take place at stated intervals (say the first Wednesday in each month), when either a Paper might be read or some subject be put forward for discussion.

It is believed that at first a permanent office will not be required; but it has been ascertained that a room in a central position can be hired for the purpose of these meetings.

For the hire of the room and for incidental expenses a small subscription, not exceeding one pound per annum, is proposed. If the present proposal meets with support, it is hoped that in time a permanent home for the Society may be established which will serve as a place of meetings for Members, where a library may be formed and a bureau for the collection and distribution of information on Central Asian subjects be established.

It is proposed to hold the first meeting on December 13th at 5 p.m. at the rooms of the Royal Asiatic Society, 22 Albemarle St. W., to discuss the constitution of the proposed Society and to hear the views of intending members.

This circular was signed by eleven names. In addition to Tupp, Younghusband and Durand they were: Colonel Mark S. Bell, VC, a Central Asian explorer and formerly Younghusband's immediate superior in the Military Intelligence Department of the Indian Army; Captain H. H. P. Deasy, who had just been awarded the Royal Geographical Society's Gold Medal for exploratory and survey work in Central Asia; Colonel Sir Thomas Holdich, an eminent Frontier surveyor of India and neighbouring territories; Sir Evan James, an Indian Civil Servant, who had explored Manchuria with Younghusband in 1886; Mr John Murray, the publisher, who had just brought out the autobiography of the Afghan Amir Abdur Rahman; Henry Norman, MP, a former Indian Army officer; Mr Henry Spenser Wilkinson, a military historian and journalist; and Mr Robert Yerburgh, MP. In addition to those signatories the names of the Earls of Dunmore and Ronaldshay were listed on the back of the circular as having expressed a willingness to join. Along with Gordon all thirteen can be regarded as the Society's Founding Members.

The embryonic Society had, as the circular suggested, approached the Royal Asiatic Society (RAS) through its secretary, Professor T. W. Rhys Davids, for the use of one of its rooms at 22 Albemarle Street. A handwritten minute of the RAS dated 14 January 1902 reads:

On the motion of Mr Irvine it was resolved to let one-third of the small room on the first floor to the Central Asian Society for £20 a year. Payment for the use of the larger rooms of this Society's tenancy to be extra, at the rate of one guinea per room per meeting held in such rooms. This letting not to interfere with previous lettings of one-third share of the same room to the Dante Society and the Oriental Translation Trust respectively. The contract on either side to be terminable by six months notice to expire on any date, and payments to be made on the quarter days.

Office space must have been limited but most of the clerical work was done by Miss C. S. Hughes, the Assistant Secretary of the RAS, who threw herself into the new venture with enthusiasm. As recalled fifty years later: 'She realised that there were people among the membership of the RAS – an incredibly learned Society – who did not wish to be learned all the time, but would like opportunities to be a little outspoken and a little critical, particularly in the forbidden realm of politics.'

The constituent meeting of the Society was duly held on 13 December in the rooms of the RAS. General Sir Thomas Gordon presided and was elected the first 'President'. Although the term 'President' was used at the time for the first five holders of that office, this was changed retrospectively to 'Presiding Chairman' on the grounds that there was no President as such until Lord Curzon held that office in 1918. Major (now) Francis Young-husband was elected Honorary Secretary and Dr Cotterell Tupp Honorary Treasurer. The first Members of Council elected (apart from the two Honorary officers) were Major General Sir Edwin Collen, a veteran of wars in Abyssinia, Afghanistan and the Sudan, and later Military Secretary to the Indian Government, who became Presiding Chairman in 1906; Colonel Algernon Durand; Colonel Sir Thomas Holdich, who soon became one of the stalwarts of the Society and its Chairman in 1904; William Irvine, a former member of the ICS and a scholar of Mogul history; Mr F. Gillett; and Mr W. E. Jardine, a serving member of the ICS on leave from India.<sup>1</sup>

Following this December meeting the number of those expressing a willingness to join the fledgling Society had increased to thirty. They included the Marquess of Breadalbane, the Earl of Dartrey, Lord Elphinstone and the Central Asian explorer and RGS Gold Medallist, St George Littledale. Another who joined shortly after was Sir Henry Drummond-Wolff, son of the Reverend Joseph Wolff, who in 1843 set out in vain to rescue the ill-fated Colonel Stoddard and Captain Conolly from the clutches of the Amir of Bokhara. With this encouragement it was decided to issue a second circular in early January 1902, along the lines of the first but reporting on the success of the December meeting. It added that the first lecture would take place on 15 January when Mr H. F. B. Lynch would speak on 'The Persian Gulf'.<sup>2</sup> The annual subscription was fixed at one pound and it was agreed that each member could bring two friends to the meetings. The circular ended by inviting others to join the Society.

Younghusband's office as Honorary Secretary was short-lived. In January 1902 he returned to India to take up an appointment as Resident in the Princely State of Indore. As a Vice President he remained titular on the Council and continued to take an interest in the Society. Summoned to Delhi the following year to attend the Durbar to commemorate the coronation of King Edward VII, he found himself at lunch one day sitting next to the Viceroy, his old friend Lord Curzon. Younghusband recalled that the Viceroy talked to him 'literally the whole time' about the frontier, local problems at Indore and the newly formed Central Asian Society.<sup>3</sup> But other than such conversations he was unable to give any practical assistance until his return to England in 1910 when he was appointed also to the Council of the Royal Geographical Society (RGS), becoming its President in 1919. In 1914 Younghusband (now Sir Francis) rejoined actively the Society's Council, often deputising for the Chairman. He graduated to Vice President again in 1920 and on retiring from that post by rotation rejoined Council as an ordinary member. He was offered the position of Chairman in 1923 but was unable to accept it due to his other commitments. In 1934 he was made an Honorary Vice President and held that office until his death in 1942.

Francis Younghusband

That Cotterell Tupp was the true founder of the Central Asian Society, formulating its nascent philosophy and practice, there is no dispute, whereas Younghusband was from the outset Tupp's main supporter, and his name attracted early interest. Although 'Tottle it up Tupp' and the explorer-mystic Younghusband appear different in temperament they became close friends. While we know too little about Tupp, we know a lot about Younghusband and little more need be said here. Biographies have been written and his own literary output was prodigious.<sup>4</sup>

Tupp, on the other hand, comes across as quieter and more self-effacing though, as we shall see, no political dove. Younghusband described him as 'a thoughtful Indian civilian'. His career centred around the legal, financial and statistical and his publications reflect this.<sup>5</sup> It was as a result of his papers on bimetallism (the monetary role of gold and silver) that the University of St Andrews conferred on him the degree of LLD. His principal work, The Indian Civil Service and the Competitive System, had a major effect on the recruitment and promotion process in the Indian Civil Service, which, prone to mistakes, had led to unjust blockages in the system. It is clear from the Preface that he wrote this seminal work during a year's sick leave from India in 1875: 'Written on the very eve of departure for India under great disadvantages of ill health ... and pressure for time ... If it should contribute to awaken in England any interest in the noble Service of which it treats, I shall feel that it will not have been written in vain.' Even in retirement Tupp devoted much energy to besieging officials at the India Office to promote his cause, and his lectures to learned societies ranged from Women's Suffrage to British campaigns in Asia and South Africa to the Silver Question. He became a Life Governor of both the School and College of the University of London, his Alma Mater. In Who's Who he listed his recreations as 'In early life cricket and racquets; later economics and Asian politics'.

In his work for the Society Tupp was ably supported by his wife, Jean, the daughter of a clergyman, who joined in her own right in 1903 and continued to attend the Society's dinners until the mid-1930s, long after his own death in 1914. A colleague recalled fifty years later: 'He was always accompanied by his wonderful wife, distinguished in appearance and each the complement of the other, gracious and friendly to all. Her lovely head of white hair moved among the members of Miss Hughes' adroit pre-lecture teas. These two did much to create the social atmosphere that gave the Society its early tone.'

Younghusband's successor as Honorary Secretary in January 1902 was Edward Penton, Jnr, who gave over fifty years' service to the Society in one position or another. At the time of the Society's inception he had been travelling in parts of Asia, but on return immediately stepped into Younghusband's shoes. The exact history here becomes confused. According to General Sir John Shea, speaking as President at the Society's Golden Jubilee Dinner in 1951, at which Penton was present, it was always intended that the latter should take the Honorary Secretary post on return from his travels and that Younghusband's position was known to be temporary. But Sir Percy Sykes, later to become a long-term and influential Honorary Secretary himself, in his obituary of Younghusband in 1942, gave a somewhat different, though probably more correct, story. 'I first met Younghusband at Rawal Pindi in 1889 ... We did not meet again until 1901 when, after my return from the Boer War, where Younghusband had been acting as a correspondent, we met in London. He informed me of plans to found what is now the Royal Central Asian Society; that he intended to retire from the army to take up the post of Honorary Secretary; and that he hoped to be elected to Parliament. I was shocked at a man of such parts giving up his career until he had reached high office, and, partly owing to my being able to propose a suitable Honorary Secretary in the person of (Sir) Edward Penton, he finally agreed to my advice.'

Either way the choice of Penton, at twenty-six, was propitious and the initial fortunes of the Society lay in both his and Tupp's hands. As the Earl of Ronaldshay said at the AGM in 1912: 'If it was not for Mr Penton we would find considerable difficulty in carrying on at all.' Educated at Rugby and Oxford he became head of a firm of leather manufacturers and from 1912 to 1913 Mayor of Marylebone. During the First World War he joined the Royal Army Clothing Department, where he persuaded Britain's boot-makers to mechanise manufacture utilising imported Indian leather. The impact of his innovations was appreciated by both British and allied forces and his efforts were recognised by a knighthood in 1918. When Chief Inspector of Clothing during the Second World War he received, inter alia, the Order of Leopold of Belgium. Honorary Secretary until 1919, he took over the post of Honorary Treasurer which, due to pressure of government work, he had to relinquish in 1939. After the war he became a Society Trustee and died in December 1967 aged ninety-two: an amazing record of service.

Following the initial lecture on the Persian Gulf, there were six further lectures in 1901 and by the end of 1907 a total of forty. Many were illustrated by lantern slides, thanks to the services of Mr Simpson of the RGS. Some were well attended, others less so. The former included a talk on 24 April 1903 by T. Gibson Bowles, MP, entitled The Baghdad Railway. Over two hundred people were present, including many non-members and journalists. It was fully reported in The Times. A lecture by George Macartney on 20 May of the same year, entitled Kashgaria, was attended by the legendary Swedish explorer Dr Sven Hedin, who also spoke. General Sir Edwin Collen's paper in March 1906 on The Defence of India was reprinted by the War Office for internal circulation. The lectures were held in the rooms of the RAS and as a result of the, at times, overcrowding, the Secretary was asked to 'make as much room as possible by taking off the doors and reducing the size of the Chairman's table'.

Although the Journal was not constituted as such until 1914, these early papers were printed and circulated to members. The public could buy them at 2/6d each. There is no record of printed papers for the period January 1902–May 1903, probably because the Society lacked the funds to cover printing expenses.

A study of the titles of the initial forty lectures shows that only a minority were in fact dedicated strictly to Central Asian subjects. Indeed the first, as we have seen, was on the Persian Gulf, there were four more on Persia, one on the colonial policy of Japan in Korea, and one in 1906 by Tupp himself on Indo-China. Five were on communication routes in Asia generally, mostly railways. One of the Society's early strengths was its ability to cater for changing political priorities. But several were quintessentially Central Asian, for example, Bokhara; Impressions of the Duab, Russian Turkestan; Chinese Turkestan and the Oxus River.

Here a word must be said about the Society's geographical remit, a subject of continuing debate given the Society's then name. From the start Professor Rhys Davids, Secretary of the RAS, described the Society as 'Central Asia Unlimited'! In 1908 Tupp wrote: 'It may be thought that we have roamed too widely and that many papers have had little relation to Central Asia; but we have had good papers offered us, which only a narrow interpretation of our Rules would exclude, and we have come at last to practically include in our sphere all Asia except Siberia and the internal affairs of India.' Internal Indian affairs, i.e., 'the plains' rather than 'the frontiers', were excluded because it was felt that this would poach on the province of other societies such as The East Indian Association, The Indian Empire Society, The South India Association and The Royal Indian Society. For the same reason lectures on both Japan and China, each of which had dedicated societies in London, were also precluded. However, these rules were soon broken. There were several early lectures on China, Japan and three on Siberia. Internal India, however, did remain an exclusive zone for many years – strangely, since the Secretary of State for India had been an ex-officio member of the Society since 1906.

If the name 'Central Asian Society' was chosen, at least partly, to differentiate it from the Royal Asiatic Society, the choice was best clarified by Lord Curzon in his Annual Dinner speech in 1908. Emphasising that the defence of India was the main focus of the Society's discussions and influence, by Central Asia was meant all those nations and powers which affected in any way her security or determined her future. These he listed as extending from Turkey to China. The phrase 'Central Asia' was not so much a geographical formula, but one defining a political problem. Penton later described 'The Central Asian Question' as the fons et origo of the Society.

Retrospectively, several prominent members of the Society have enlarged on these themes. Lord Peel, President at the 25th Anniversary Dinner in 1926 explained: 'Defining our area of interest was always a problem, but we are almost conterminous with the Moslem world ... and regard the Red Sea as a very unnecessary geographical limit to our studies.' From its early years the Society declared it would always be interested in the development of Islam in Egypt and in other countries outside its geographical area.<sup>6</sup> Sir Ronald Storrs, at the Annual Dinner in 1928, stated: 'The Society's remit is that great triangle based on Constantinople, Cairo and Calcutta from which have been produced three, or if we include Buddhism four, of the great religions of the world.' Sir Arnold Wilson, speaking at the Annual Dinner in 1931, after the Society had received its Royal Charter, suggested, ingeniously, that the problem was the positioning of the adjective 'Central': 'We are in reality the Royal Central Society for Asia.' But perhaps a more compelling view was expressed by Professor Charles Beckingham in 1986: 'I think what our Founders had in mind then was probably what would now be the five Soviet Republics of Central Asia [Turkmenistan, Uzbekistan, Kazakhstan, Kyrgyzstan and Tajikistan], Afghanistan, Sinkiang (then called Chinese Turkestan), Mongolia, Tibet, Nepal, Kashmir and Ladakh. But one thing leads to another. If you take an interest in Tibet, you become involved with China: if with China, then Korea, Japan etc. As time went on the Society found itself taking an interest in virtually any part of Asia.'

By 1903 the Society appeared to be running smoothly under the 'Presiding Chairmanship' of Sir Alfred Lyall. His appointment must have given considerable prestige to the embryonic society for he was both a renowned statesman and a man of letters. He had served for thirty-one years in India, including the post of Foreign Secretary under Lord Lytton and the Marquis of Ripon. Subsequently he became Lieutenant Governor of the North West Provinces. On return to England he served for fifteen years as a member of the Council of India in London. He was a founder member of the British Academy and a poet; his little volume Verses written in India is a delight. A friend and biographer of Tennyson, he was on a visit to one of his sons in the Isle of Wight in 1911 when he died of a heart attack aged seventy-six.

Of relevance to the history of the Society is the unusual stand Lyall took regarding Britain's relations with Russia. This was influenced by his experiences during the Indian Mutiny when he narrowly escaped with his life at Meerut. He regarded the behaviour there, and elsewhere, of the Muslim insurgents as cruel and savage and saw the fall of Constantinople to Islam as Europe's greatest tragedy. Thus he strongly supported Russia in her conflict with Turkey, whereas most in India, even the Hindus, supported Turkey. Lyall considered that Russia had a legitimate interest in extending her power to the borders of British India. He maintained that the British would have done the same to bring the tribes to order. The important thing was to ensure that the Russians went no further, and this could only be achieved, he argued, by an agreement which he was confident they would keep. His stand had influenced the Anglo-Russian agreement on the Pamirs in 1895 and the Anglo-Russian Convention of 1907.<sup>7</sup> But, as we shall see, his was something of a lone voice among the hawkish majority of the Society's 'inner cabinet'.

Sir Alfred Lyall

A letter from Tupp to Younghusband written in early September 1903 gives a clear idea of both the hawkish attitude towards Russia prevalent at the time and offers some intriguing comments on several of the Society's leading members.<sup>8</sup> It also reveals something of Tupp's own personality. By the time the letter arrived Younghusband would have been engrossed in preparations for the British invasion of Tibet the following January.

My dear Younghusband,

I have been intending to write to you for a long time, but I put it off ... thinking you might have difficulty in getting letters. ... We have heard very little about your mission, but I am very glad that it was created and that you accepted it, for it may mean a great deal in the future; and any stirring up of the waters on the Tibet frontier is a good thing, after our years of inaction. Have you been allowed to go much beyond our frontier and is there any hope of opening up the country in any way or of forestalling Russia? Of course anything you tell me I will keep rigidly secret, but you know how interested I am in the question ...

I gave a lecture on Tibet at the Central Asian Society and I got Sir A Lyall to back me up in saying that whatever happened we must never allow Russia to take Tibet. All the newspapers reported it and I think it did some good in attracting attention to the subject, but I was very disgusted with Macartney of Kashgar when he lectured, for he said openly (he being our Political there) that we would have to let Russia take it. I say certainly not. Without any war, we can let Russia know that we will not let her have either Tibet or Chinese Turkestan; and we can agree on her taking Mongolia and Zangaria and leaving us the former two. The only way with Russia is to tell her what you mean to do and that she will have to fight if she opposes it. She never fights when warned beforehand, but she will encroach and break Frontiers ad infinitum. I hope you will be able to adopt a forward policy as regards Tibet. The Russians are undoubtedly intriguing with Tibet thro' the Mongolians, Buriats etc; and it is quite time we took action from the South.

Of course I know that you know much more about all this than I do; but I have read a good deal more since you left and I remember you once saying that you did not see how we could hold Chinese Turkestan. I hope your new experience may have changed your views and that you now agree with me and that we should draw the line at the Thian Shan Mts and tell Russia she shall not come south of that.

The Central Asian Society has gone on very well and we have had some very good lectures, notably T. G. Bowles, MP [on The Baghdad Railway] which was crammed and we had 20 reporters. I sent you out 100 copies of our new Rules and List of Members, addressing them to Lahore...

I enclose you a copy of the Memo which I drew up on the Progress of the Society. Penton makes a very good Secretary in most respects, but he is rather too young and flighty for it. He sometimes makes extraordinary proposals which we have to sit on. Sir A. Lyall is of course a tower of strength in name as our Chairman and it has done us good publicity to have him, but he is not an ideal Chairman. He is very impatient and always wants to get away as quickly as he can, so that he cuts speakers short and often prevents men who are shy from speaking at all. Sir Thos. Gordon does not show much interest in it and hardly ever comes and that lazy beggar Algy Durand hasn't shown his face once this year. He is too busy admiring his new uniform as one of the King's bodyguard. Collen, Irvine and Gillett are the most useful members of the Council. I suppose you will be back in India by November and I hope when you can make time you will send me a few lines saying what has been the result of your mission.

'... too busy admiring his new uniform ...'

If there is any part of what you tell me which I may mention to the Society or otherwise, please tell me clearly which it is – all the rest I shall regard as confidential ... Have you formed any plans about coming home again? I would not stay out too long if I were you. Nothing makes up for being away from England ... With kind regards to Mrs Younghusband.

Yours sincerely,
A. Cotterell Tupp

Lyall's stand on Tibet was perhaps surprising given his policy of entente towards Russia. But when it came to the 1907 Anglo-Russian Convention he was at odds with most of the Society's prominent members. The Convention was drawn up by Sir Edward Grey, Foreign Secretary in the Liberal government of Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman. Grey and his Russian counterpart were determined to limit the rivalry between the two empires in Asia. This, with particular reference to Tibet, Afghanistan and Persia, was deemed crucial to India's defence. It was signed in St Petersburg on 31 August. In essence both sides agreed to refrain from interfering in Tibet's internal affairs and Afghanistan was confirmed as lying within the British sphere of influence. Persia was to be divided in three ways: Russia in the north, Britain in the south (covering access to the Gulf), with a neutral zone between. A secondary, but undeclared, aim of the Convention was to check German ambitions eastwards.

It was the Persian aspect of the agreement which most incensed the hawks on both sides of the government and in the Society itself. They regarded it as a sell-out since most of the major cities lay within the Russian sphere. In July 1907 the Society, learning of the draft agreement and determined to show it had some political influence, addressed a lengthy memorandum to the Foreign Secretary. It expressed in strong terms its concern that the proposed Russian zone was crossed by caravan routes conveying British and Indian merchandise to the cities of Persia, and that it threatened the great trade route between Teheran and Baghdad via Kermanshah. The note concluded: 'The Council ... desires to place on record that it is not aware of any consideration of general policy in Asia or elsewhere, which should induce us to give up any established British interests to Russia without receiving an established Russian interest in return.'

The wording of the memorandum implied that Council knew its business – many of its members were 'there' – and that the government did not and were not! It is hard to imagine the Society proffering such political advice today. There is no archival record of any government reply to this memorandum, but it is clearly not one to which Lyall would have put his name. But by 1907 Lyall was no longer Chairman, having handed over to Colonel Sir Thomas Holdich in 1904. He was succeeded in 1906 by General Sir Edwin Collen. In 1907 the Society's new Chairman was Mr (later Sir) Valentine Chirol, a celebrated traveller and influential journalist who in 1903, whilst Foreign Editor of The Times, wrote The Middle East Question and some Problems of Indian Defence.

As we have shown, from its outset the Society was determined to cover Asia as a whole, and there are today members of the Society who regard as romantics those believing that its origins lay in what has become known as the 'Great Game'. But the real concern was the security of India and many of its founding members did distrust Russian intentions and felt that the public should be warned of the dangers to come. One of the last lectures in this period under review was The Strategic Position of Russia in Central Asia, and retrospective statements confirm this early fear. At the AGM in 1915 Sir Thomas Holdich said: 'The war is having a great effect on Central Asia ... The matter which concerns us most, and which we think about most in this connection, is the speed and influence of Russia through regions which lie southward of her present borderland.' (Later Holdich became as dismissive of Russia's ability to invade India as he was of Germany's to move eastwards at the close of the First World War.<sup>9</sup>) In the same year Sir Mortimer Durand commented: 'One of the objects with which the Society was originally formed was to study the progress of Russia in Central Asia.' At the Annual Dinner in 1953 the Chairman, Admiral Sir Cecil Harcourt, reminded his audience: 'This Society was founded at a time when Russia appeared to be threatening India, and it was founded to draw attention to that part of the world and what went on there.' Even as late as the mid-1950s, a circular advertising the Society stated: 'In the present century, the growing development and speed of means of communication of all kinds are making the influence of the great inland powers, the USSR and China, equal to or surpassing that of maritime powers.' True, this was the 'Cold War Game' rather than the 'Great Game' but none the less it shows the Society's continuing concern about Russian intentions.

On 16 May 1907 the Society, now feeling itself firmly established with 107 members, held its first Annual Dinner at the Imperial Restaurant, Regent Street. Twenty-four members attended. The two guests of the Society were, appropriately, the Presidents of the two related senior societies: Lord Reay of the Royal Asiatic and Sir George Goldie of the Royal Geographical. The dinner henceforth became an annual event.

Nothing conveys more the atmosphere of the early years of the Society than the speech made by Sir Edward Penton at the Golden Jubilee Dinner in 1951. He was the only one of the original members who was still able to attend. He described Tupp as the Society's 'Godfather' and Miss Hughes (later, on marriage, to become Mrs Frazer) as the Society's 'Nanny'. 'A brilliant Secretary ... she forged a link which did much at its foundation to make the Society possible. The Society's rooms, those of the RAS, were incongruously situated over Asprey's Albemarle Street shop. I notice that the door and staircase, which then led to our rooms, is now closed, so that nothing so indiscreet should ever occur there again.' Penton continued:

Among its founders were Francis Younghusband – a veritable Mahatma – with his legendary reputation as traveller, political officer and author; the soldiers Thomas Gordon and Edwin Collen; the politicals Algy Durand – more like an ambassador than any ambassador could ever have been – and Lepel Griffin, always gay and debonair; Lord Zetland – Lord Ronaldshay as he was then – fresh from service on Lord Curzon's staff, with his distinguished career ahead of him; and many others whose names can be traced in the Society's records. But there are two whose boldness of conception and courageous outlook are engraved on my memory: Sir Thomas Holdich, the geographer and engineer, and Sir Alfred Lyall, the statesman.

At its start many of the Founders read papers, sometimes more than once ... for the Society was not well enough known to attract lecturers who had something to say and wanted a platform to say it from. Besides, it was embarrassing to ask eminent travellers, and others possessed of unique knowledge, to risk addressing a very sparsely attended meeting ... I lived in agony for the last thirty minutes before every lecture, watching the empty chairs fill, and trying to induce latecomers to occupy the vacant front row ... I shall never forget how at one of our early meetings a disappointed speaker, himself a member of the Society, who instead of empty chairs had anticipated an audience eager to absorb his views, forced me to accompany him up Bond Street to listen to his vituperations, until at last, having led me into his tailors, he switched his wrath on the cutter because his trousers did not fit to his liking!

But what was the reason for founding the Society and courting those early struggles? There are doubtless many versions ... But I have a conviction, bred of long observation, that the Society was founded by men who through a lifetime's experience, recognised the constant conflict of the peoples of the Heartland and the sea-going nations on the perimeter. You may particularise it if you like as 'the integrity of India': but instinctively those founders realised the wider dangers, and it was because of their fervent anxiety to preserve their work that they founded the Society to warn their countrymen of the perils to come.

Some wanted to preserve the status quo at all costs – by which they meant to prevent Russian access to the Persian Gulf. But there were others, notably Sir Alfred Lyall, who realised that coming events could not be merely resisted, but had to be accepted and moulded to our advantage. I remember an argument at a Council meeting specially convened to discuss the Berlin to Baghdad Railway, the bogey of the moment. There were several notable members present. Sir Alfred, by that time a very old man, sat apart, a gaunt solitary figure, his head bent forward with his chin resting on his chest, neither moving nor speaking and looking like a moulting bird. An unconstructively hostile resolution was ultimately accepted, but as other members rose to go and I was completing my notes, Sir Alfred's hand shot out to seize me by the wrist: 'See that I am not associated with that resolution,' he hissed. The wise old statesman's final protest. Impossible as it may sound now, Sir Edward Grey in 1907 reached an agreement with Russia over spheres of influence in Persia.

You might imagine that the Society would have been delighted at his success, but instead its first reaction was 'what are we going to talk about? Was it the Society's death knell?' But that impression was momentary. There was still a wide scope for discussion!

Aficionados of the 'Great Game' hold that the era finally came to an end with the 1907 Anglo-Russian Convention. But of course it was all torn up when the Bolsheviks came to power in 1918 and a new 'Game' started when, in the best tradition of those Founding Fathers, many colourful members of the Society took part in it. There was, indeed, 'a wide scope for discussion'.

ANNEX TO CHAPTER I

The following, who joined the Society in 1901 and 1902, are listed as the Society's 'Original Members'. Those marked with an asterisk may be considered the Founding Members.

II

THE YEARS OF STRUGGLE

1908–1919

So far as the future of the Society is concerned there is no means of saying what its prospects may be; they must be more or less on the knees of the gods.

Colonel Sir Thomas Holdich, AGM, 1915

In March 1908, as part of a planned recruiting drive, Cotterell Tupp was asked to write a brief history of the Society up to that date. Having extolled its successes, he concluded: 'We are now in our seventh year and it will hardly be denied that we have justified our existence; but we have not met with as much support as we might reasonably have anticipated. Our numbers hover about the round hundred and unless we can increase that number, we cannot print all our papers and we cannot even begin the formation of a Library.' Six hundred copies of this history were printed and distributed. Messrs King and Co. were asked to arrange its circulation among 'Residents and Chief Political Officers in India; Chief Political Officers in the Persian Gulf and Turkish Arabia and to Consuls and Vice Consuls in China and Persia'.

In the same year the Chairmanship was passed to the Earl of Ronaldshay, MP, later to become the Marquis of Zetland, at the young age of thirty-three. A Founder Member, he served the Society continuously through various offices until his death in 1961 at the age of eighty-five. His great interest in life was India and he was an expert on the Hindu and Buddhist religions. He served as Governor of Bengal from 1916–1922 and later as Secretary of State for India from 1935–1940. His writings included the official three-volume biography of Curzon. Before Ronaldshay, each Chairman had held office for one or two years only, though the rules stated he could be re-elected annually. But his tenure was popular and lasted six years during which he actively supported Tupp and Penton's recruiting drive.

The Society's Rules

Before continuing further it may be useful to pause here and study how the Rules of the Society evolved. This should make it easier to follow the subsequent appointments of the various office holders and other developments in the chronology.

The Earl of Ronaldshay travelling in China as a young man

From the outset rules were drawn up to regulate the affairs of the Society. They defined and directed its aims; charitable status; management of properties and assets and action thereto in the event of dissolution; appointment of Council and its officers; categories of membership; payment of subscriptions and other such matters. The details changed over the years as the Society became more established and increased its membership.

The President, once that office was established, and Chairman were both elected by Council each holding office for a set period, thence eligible for re-election. Vice Presidents, up to a maximum of ten, were similarly elected, two retiring by rotation. The tradition gradually evolved whereby the two senior members of Council automatically progressed to that position. However, the office was abolished as nugatory in 1997. But that of Honorary Vice President continued, the appointees being elected by Council for their 'meritorious service'.

Council itself, originally comprising ten members, eventually increased to twenty, was elected at the Anniversary Meeting (AGM), again each member holding office for a set period and only eligible for re-election after a year's interval. The offices of Honorary Secretary, Treasurer and, on the formation of the Library in 1922, Librarian were proposed by Council and similarly elected at the AGM. Three Trustees were also appointed for the purpose of vesting in their name the property, funds, deeds of title and documents of the Society.

Both sexes were eligible for ordinary membership from the start. Other membership categories that subsequently evolved were Affiliate, Corporate and Junior Members. Honorary members, up to a maximum of ten, have also been elected for 'distinguished service in, or knowledge of, Asia'. At the time of the Society's centenary they numbered six.

Despite the recruiting drive by 1912 attendance at some lectures was disappointingly low. At first this was put down to a preoccupation with the Balkan War. In June 1913, with the membership still only around 120, Council considered some urgent measures, such as the possibility of an amalgamation with the Persia Society or some arrangement with the Royal Asiatic Society (RAS) whereby the Society became its 'Political Branch'. It even considered obtaining a list of members of the China Society with a view to some poaching. No firm decisions were made until the next meeting when the following was decided: (a) meetings of the Society should be advertised in the Athenaeum, Travellers, East India and United Service Clubs as well as one of the Ladies' Clubs and the Royal Geographical Society (RGS); (b) any member of the above could attend a lecture of the Society on presentation of a visitor's card; (c) the Society's publications should be made more encompassing by listing a diary of associated events, new books and articles of relevant interest in other magazines and quarterlies; and (d) overseas members should be asked to give news of the countries in which they were living, which could also be used in this way. This was before the birth of the Journal in 1914; previously lectures, progress reports and other news had been published in off-prints entitled Proceedings of the Central Asian Society.

One reason for the slow increase in membership was that many resigned on being posted abroad during the war, and some were killed in action. But a good number of overseas members did stay. For example, in 1919, the end of the period under review, there were 139 members in the Society. Of those, 35 lived overseas, of whom 25 were in India (their subscription was 12 rupees p.a.). Many of the new members in India were recruited by virtue of their office, rather than their person. These included the Agents, or Residents or Secretaries to the Governments of Delhi, Quetta, Peshawar, Bangalore, Rajputana, Bombay, Bahrain and Kuwait. Clearly Messrs King & Co. had done their job well.

Some interesting new members joined during this period, many of whom we shall meet again later: Sir Percy Cox; Major Percy Sykes; Captain F. M. Bailey; Lieut P. T. Etherton; Colonel J. G. Kelly, known as 'Chitral Kelly' due to the part he played in the relief of the Chitral Fort in 1895, who became an active member of Council serving from 1913 to 1919; George Macartney of Kashgar, who joined the Council in 1919; Dr Aurel Stein; Lieut Colonel J. K. Tod; Major Reginald Teague-Jones, who served with General Malleeson's Mission in Transcaspia; and the Arabian explorer Mr H. St J. B. Philby. The Society's first Asian member, Bahadur Sahibzada Abdul Qaiyum Khan, CIE, Assistant Political Agent, Khaiber, NWFP, joined in 1910 and the second, Sirdar Ikbāl Ali Shah, joined in 1918. Ikbāl became a frequent lecturer and was probably the first Afghan to address an audience in London. Some overseas members had rather exotic addresses: Mr H. G. G. Perry-Ayscough gave his as c/o The Chinese Post Office, Shanghai, China, via Siberia; and Captain J. W. Watson as HBM Consulate, Tarbat-i-Haidari, Meshed, via Askabad, Transcaspia, Russia. But if the membership continued low in number, it was high in quality. As Sir Thomas Holdich said in 1914: 'If [we are] a comparatively small society, numbered among its members are men having the right to say they know at first hand more about Asia than anyone could tell them in any other society.'

Apart from the varying lecture attendance there was also the problem of finding lecturers, especially when some speakers suddenly found themselves posted abroad at short notice. But the talks continued to cover topics of interest, some with appealing titles: Gun Running in the Persian Gulf; A Typical Day's March in Eastern Bokhara; and Adventures with Armoured Cars in Russia and the East. There were several on Afghanistan; indeed in the history of the Society there have been more lectures on this subject than any other. As Lord Curzon said at the Annual Dinner in 1908: 'If the Central Asian Society exists and is meeting fifty or a hundred years hence, Afghanistan will be as vital and important a question as it is now.' There were several more on China, despite the supposed restriction, one being delivered by 'a Chinese gentleman holding high office in Peking,'<sup>1</sup> and others on Asian Communication Routes, especially railways, still a favourite topic. Some covered the war – Japan's Part in the War; Turkey the War and Climatic Influences in Turkey and The Near East and the War. This latter was attended by the modernist Indian Shiite Muslim thinker, Syed Ameer Ali, a former High Court Judge and Privy Councillor. He rose from the audience at the end of the talk to say, 'We Indian Moslems are British citizens and we love the British Empire.' Just as well, if true, for at that moment the Germans were planning a Jihad of Indian Muslims against the British via Afghanistan. In 1918 Syed Ameer gave the Anniversary Lecture entitled Persia and Her Neighbours when he listed 'Romanoff' atrocities in the region, emphasising Britain's lack of wisdom in signing the 1907 Convention with Russia.

The Anniversary Lecture the following year, 1919, was given by Sir George Macartney on Bolshevism as I saw it at Tashkent in 1919. Publication of this lecture in the Journal was delayed until 1920 – 'until it was known that Lieut Colonel F. M. Bailey was out of reach of Bolshevik animosity'. In the autumn of 1919 Bailey, in order to effect his escape from Tashkent, whence he had been sent to report on Bolshevik activity, had disguised himself as an Albanian army clerk. In a brazen scheme he had got himself recruited by a branch of the General Staff, Voinye Kontrol, recently separated from Cheka, the Bolshevik Secret Service. Its role was to track down foreign spies. Bailey's brief was to report on British activity in Bokhara, including any information on a British officer named Colonel Bailey! The Society had to wait impatiently until 1921 for Bailey's own account of his experiences.

The Society, keen to make its influence felt as widely as possible, became involved in a number of minor extra-mural issues in this period. In December 1911, Sir Thomas Holdich and Dr Tupp represented the Society in a joint deputation with the RAS to the Board of Education over the appointment of an expert to supervise the Indian Section at the South Kensington Museum. In March 1914 it accepted an invitation from the Organising Committee of the Oriental Congress to send a representative to its meetings. Next came an unexpected development concerning Chinese astronomical instruments. On 11 December 1918 Mr J. O. Bland delivered a lecture on China.<sup>2</sup> It was chaired by Sir Edmund Barrow, who had been General Sir Alfred Gaselee's Chief of Staff on the expedition sent to Peking in 1900 to relieve the Legation beleaguered by the Boxer rebels. During the course of the lecture questions were asked about the rare astronomical instruments that had been taken by the Germans from Peking to Potsdam, and later moved to Berlin. A correspondent of The Times, present at the talk, had taken notes. The following day an article appeared in that newspaper, quoting the lecture, about the German looting of the Chinese instruments, some of Mongolian origin. This sparked a public outcry and in March 1919 the Germans agreed to return them to China. This was a plus for the Society, albeit more by accident than design.

Sir George Macartney and General Ma Titai at Kashgar, 1918 [RSAA Archives]

Bailey's escort in the Karakum Desert between the Oxus and the Murghab rivers during his escape from Bokhara to Meshed, December 1919. Left to right: Awal Nur and Kalbi Muhammad (NCOs in the Corps of Guides) with (?)Haider, Bailey's Punjabi servant [RSAA Archives]

In 1914 Lord Ronaldshay was posted to India and the Chairmanship passed to Sir Mortimer Durand, who held it for the next four years. Sir Mortimer was the brother of Algernon, one of the Founding Members. He is best remembered for what became known as 'the Durand Line', demarcating the border between Afghanistan and the NWFP of India. (Confusingly, it was Algernon who wrote the book entitled The Making of a Frontier.) His mission as Foreign Secretary to the Amir Abdur Rahman in Kabul in 1893 paved the way for that ruler's relative co-operation and the Anglo-Russian agreement of 1895. In 1894 Durand was sent as Minister to Teheran and subsequently held high diplomatic posts in Europe and America.<sup>3</sup>

Sir Mortimer Durand

Dr Alfred Cotterell Tupp died in September 1914 aged seventy-four. Honorary Treasurer in name, he had been the Society's 'God-father' and guiding hand since its inception. He had become ill the previous year and, unable to attend meetings, asked to be relieved of his duties. But his role was so crucial that he was persuaded to continue work from home. By March 1914 he was unable to do even that and instead accepted a nominal position as Vice President. Meanwhile, Sir Evan James, another Founder Member, took on the post of Honorary Treasurer.

The Annual Dinners continued. In 1908 Lord Curzon, a member but yet to become President, was the guest speaker. Invitations to attend the dinner were sent to the Morning Post, the Daily Telegraph, the Standard, Daily Chronicle and the Press Association. In 1909 Dr Aurel Stein was the guest speaker and the Russian Ambassador was invited. The dinner proposed for 1912 was cancelled for lack of support and in 1914 the venue was changed from the Imperial Hotel, Regent Street to the Savoy. There were no dinners during the war; they recommenced in 1920.

The expenses and accounts of the Society in its early years look modest enough at this distance, though no doubt at the time they were critical. The annual balance sheet in 1908 totalled about £150 and by 1918 had only increased to just over £200. Subscription rates remained at £1 (compared to the £4 levied by the RGS at this time) and the Annual Dinner cost was pegged at 10/6d. Rent for the office was £20 and the Secretary's annual salary was £25. In 1908 the Honorary Treasurer was delighted to be able to report that there was £44 lodged in the bank, which was considered 'very satisfactory and will last for the next six months'. With some reluctance it was agreed to pay £2 each year to the RAS for the use of their telephone. One of the most expensive items was the hire of the slide lantern from the RGS for £9.9.0. Some of these figures rose considerably with post-war inflation.

In 1917 Lieut Colonel Sir Henry Trotter was appointed Chairman. A Royal Engineer, he had gone to India in 1860 and joined the Trigonometric Survey. He accompanied Sir Douglas Forsyth on his famous mission to Yagub Beg in Yarkand and Kashgar from 1873 to 1874, after which he was employed on 'Special Duties' in China. Subsequently he served as an additional Military Attaché in Constantinople to cover the Turko-Russian war, travelling with the Turkish army to do so. This was followed by appointments in Kurdistan, Constantinople again, Syria and Romania: a total of forty-six years' Crown Service. Above all he was a great sportsman and was the first European to have shot an Ovis Poli, the wild sheep of the Pamirs, later to become the Society's emblem. On retirement he busied himself not only with the affairs of the Society, but also with the RGS, RAS and the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel. For much of his term of office he was terminally ill and Sir Francis Younghusband virtually took his place.

Transcaspian Episode

One of the most significant events of the war period in which existing or future members of the Society took part became known as the Transcaspian Episode. The Russian Revolution in 1917 and the rapid spread of Bolshevik influence to many parts of the Russian empire raised the likelihood of a peace treaty between the new Russian regime and Germany. This could lead to a Turkish or German advance on India via the Caucasus, Transcaspia or Persia, where hitherto Imperial Russian forces had blocked the way. Germany had its eye on Baku oil and Turkestan gun cotton, and Enver Pasha dreamed of a Pan-Turanian empire spreading eastwards over most of Central Asia. The Brest-Litovsk Treaty of March 1918 confirmed the worst fears of British strategists, and four British missions were organised to counter the threat. One mission under General Lionel Dunsterville (Kipling's 'Stalky'), known as Dunsterforce, was despatched from Mesopotamia to Enzeli on the southern shore of the Caspian with a view to bolstering local defences in Baku or destroying oil facilities there in the event of a Turkish or German victory in the Caucasus.<sup>4</sup> Another, under General Wilfred Malleon, known as Mallmiss, was sent from India through eastern Persia to Meshed, south of Ashkabad and the Transcaspian railway.<sup>5</sup> The third, under Commodore David Norris, was detailed to establish a flotilla on the Caspian to back up both Dunsterville and Malleon.<sup>6</sup> A fourth, under Major F. M. Bailey was, as mentioned, dispatched to Tashkent via Kashgar to assess the intentions of the new Bolshevik regime in that region.<sup>7</sup> In addition Colonel Denis Knollys commanded the British Indian contingent that was deployed inside Transcaspia.<sup>8</sup>

Dunsterforce eventually reached Baku in stages from Enzeli only to find local troops too involved in nationalist politics to offer any serious resistance to the Turks. By dint of subterfuge and with the help of Norris's Caspian flotilla, Dunsterville managed to evacuate his forces to Enzeli, whence he was redirected to Krasnovodsk. Meanwhile, Malleon was ordered to carry out intelligence and military operations across the Russian frontier to prevent the Transcaspian railway being taken over by Turkish or Bolshevik forces. However, the collapse of Germany and her allies, and the temporary reoccupation of Baku by British forces, changed the strategic situation, and by March 1919 all British and Indian troops were withdrawn from Transcaspia either to Meshed or to Baku. In addition to the officers mentioned above, others involved in this military 'sideshow', who were later to recount their experiences either in lectures to the Society or in books and articles, included Captain Edward Noel, Major L. V. S. Blacker, and Captain C. H. Ellis.<sup>9</sup> But one officer, Captain Reginald Teague-Jones, remained silent throughout his life. Teague-Jones joined the Society in 1919, only to rejoin it in 1921 in the name of Major Ronald Sinclair, an identity which he maintained until he died in 1988. He was Malleon's liaison officer with the Menshevik government in Ashkabad, which had revolted against the Bolshevik

Soviet in Tashkent but whose position remained precarious. Malleeson had agreed to supply Ashkabad with military support, equipment and finance in return for their co-operation against the threat of a Turkish advance across the Caspian or potentially hostile moves by the Tashkent Soviet. Teague-Jones was the lynchpin of Malleeson's highly efficient intelligence network: 'There was hardly a train on the Central Asian railway which had not one of our agents on board, and there was no important railway centre which had not two or three men on the spot.'

Menshevik supporters at Ashkabad [Colonel W. Nash]

In September 1918 twenty-six Bolshevik Commissars led by Stepan Shaumian, escaping from Baku across the Caspian, ended up in Krasnovodsk where they were arrested by the local anti-Bolshevik Commandant, Kuhn, who then asked the Ashkabad authorities what should be done with them. The latter referred the matter to Malleeson for advice. The accepted version of events, recorded in lectures to the Society by Malleeson and others, and in British official sources, is that Malleeson proposed that the Commissars should be sent direct from Krasnovodsk to him in Meshed for onward transmission to British India, where they could be held hostage against the return or release of British officers, including Bailey and Noel, who had disappeared. However, by the time Malleeson's reply reached Ashkabad, Kuhn had already arranged for all twenty-six Commissars to be shot in a remote spot along the Transcaspian railway, east of Krasnovodsk. The Soviet government made great play of blaming the British for complicity in the massacre, even accusing Teague-Jones of having had a direct hand in it. The incident became a cause célèbre between Moscow and London, the more so because Shaumian had been a personal friend of Lenin. Trotsky's violent and quite unjustified denunciation of Teague-Jones in May 1922 gave the latter good reason to take seriously the threat of Soviet reprisals but by then he had changed his name to Ronald Sinclair.

Years later, a letter was published in the Observer from a former officer on Malleeson's staff in Meshed, Colonel William Nash. As Captain Nash he was ADC and Staff Officer to Malleeson and had left India for Persia with him in June 1917. Writing on 4 March 1956, Nash declared that 'to the best of my recollection' the Ashkabad authorities' request for advice as to what to do with the Commissars had come in the form of a telegram which he had personally taken to Malleeson – 'at that time in bed with a severe attack of malaria' – to ask him what reply he should send. 'He told me that it was essentially a matter for the Russian authorities, and that he did not see his way to interfere. I therefore had a telegram put into Russian to the effect that they must dispose of the Commissars as they thought fit.' However, when Malleson was informed of the massacre he sent a further telegram instructing Teague-Jones to inform the Ashkabad authorities of his horror at what had happened.<sup>10</sup> A current member of the Society, Mr James Nash, recalls his father, Colonel William Nash, speaking of the affair. At the time of writing he is in contact with a Russian film editor researching for a documentary on the incident. This illustrates well the Society's continuing links with notable Asian events of the past.<sup>11</sup>

Star of Bokhara, 3rd Class, awarded to Captain William Nash

In 1918 Lord Curzon accepted the invitation, arranged through his friend Sir Francis Younghusband, to become the Society's first President, a post he held until his death in 1925. Curzon had joined the Society in 1907. In May 1909 he declined the offer of Chairmanship but agreed to become a Vice President. The weight of his name undoubtedly gave prestige and influence to the Society. At the Annual Dinner in 1920, the first since his appointment, he said: 'I regard the Society with great interest and peculiar affection. I do so because during the greatest part of my life Central Asia has been my study, I might almost say my hobby ... I regard my invitation to become your Honorary President ... as a culminating point in my study of Asia.' His obituarist in the Journal, anxious to play down the popular myth of his supposed arrogance, wrote: 'Socially no one could be more agreeable and interesting, whilst officially no one could be more impressive and inspiring.' He gave many illuminating and amusing addresses to the Society, especially at the Annual Dinners. Two of his daughters followed him into the Society: the Baroness Ravensdale, his eldest, in 1935, who was closely involved in Younghusband's 'World Congress of Faiths', and Lady Alexandra Metcalfe in 1939. The latter was awarded the Sir Percy Sykes Memorial Medal in 1988 for her work with the Save the Children Fund in Asia.

Letter from Sir Henry Trotter to the Rt. Hon. Earl Curzon of Kedleston.

18 Eaton Place.
17th December, 1917.

Dear Lord Curzon,

The Council of the Central Asian Society at a recent Meeting authorized me as their Chairman to write to your Lordship to invite your Lordship's consent to your nomination as Honorary President of the Society.

This is a new Office which it is proposed to create and it is felt that the efficiency of the Society would be increased and its status raised by having so distinguished a statesman at its head.

The duties of the post would be nominal. The President would of course preside at any ordinary Meeting which he might desire to attend, also (if present) at the annual dinners, (which however have been discontinued during the War).

Your Lordship is already a Vice-President of the Society and it would be a great pleasure to the Council and to myself personally if so high an authority on Central Asia would honour us by accepting the post of Honorary President.

If I had thought that the work would have taken any appreciable portion of your valuable time I would not have ventured to make the proposal, but having done so I trust that your Lordship's reply may be favourable.

Believe me

yours very truly
Henry Trotter.

The Rt. Hon. Earl Curzon's reply to Sir Henry Trotter.

1 Carlton House Terrace.
S.W. 1.
Dec. 21st, 1917.

Dear Sir Henry Trotter,

I cannot resist so high a compliment as that which is offered me by a Society with whose work and aspirations I have so much sympathy as the Central Asian Society, the more so as your Council have so considerably safeguarded me against calls which in the existing condition of affairs it would be impossible for me to meet. Some day I hope we may all have more leisure.

Begging you to thank your Council for the honour,
I am,

Yours very truly
Curzon.

With the death of Sir Henry Trotter in 1919, Lord Carnock took over as Chairman. As Sir Arthur Nicolson he had held diplomatic posts in Berlin, Constantinople, Teheran, Budapest, Tangier, Madrid and finally as Ambassador in St Petersburg. Like Sir Alfred Lyall, his policy towards Russia was one of entente. On return to England in 1910, he was appointed Under Secretary of State at the Foreign Office until his retirement in 1916.

In the same year the Society moved its offices, along with its RAS host, to 74 Grosvenor Square. This time the agreement was to hire a room jointly with the Anglo-Italian Literary Society for £50 a year, of which the Society paid £30. This sharing did not prove entirely satisfactory.

However, the most important event in 1919 was the appointment of a new Honorary Secretary. Due to pressure of other work Sir Edward Penton had asked to step down, but agreed to replace Sir Evan James in the less onerous post of Honorary Treasurer, which he held until 1939. Another change was caused by the resignation, on marriage, of Miss Hughes, the Society's 'Nanny'. Her place as Secretary was taken by Miss L. B. Phillips, the new assistant secretary at the RAS. But who was to be the new Honorary Secretary in this game of musical chairs?

The Society was still ailing in the sense that its membership had climbed to only 139, an increase of a mere thirty in twelve years. The appointment of Lieut Colonel A. C. Yate to fill the post gave it a much needed impetus and saved it from possible extinction.

Arthur Campbell Yate was the son of a clergyman. Like his brother, Colonel Sir Charles Yate, also a member of the Society, he was educated at Shrewsbury. He entered the army in 1875 serving with the 1st West India Regiment before transferring to the Bombay Staff Corps. He took part in the Second Afghan War and the Burmese Expedition of 1886. In 1903 he took command of the 129th (Duke of Connaught's Own) Baluchis. During his time in India, and later, he wrote various books and contributions to reviews, magazines and newspapers. His knowledge was refreshed by constant travel. At his home at Beckbury Hall, Shifnal, Shropshire, he had one of the finest private libraries of books on Central Asia in Britain. Many of these came to the Society's Library on his death in 1929 aged seventy-six, only four days after that of his wife.

Though an original member of the Society, Yate did not retire from the Indian Army until 1905, when he became a regular attender at the Society's functions. In 1911 he was elected to the Council on which his brother was also serving. He took a hand in editing the embryonic Journal in 1914. There were few stalwarts left behind during the Great War to manage the affairs of the Society but Yate was certainly one of them. However, his great work came on his appointment as Honorary Secretary. Although he lived in Shropshire he rarely missed a meeting and commuted weekly to the Society's offices. It is not surprising that on his death in 1929 his Journal obituarist was moved to write: 'Never has an institution existing for the study of current Eastern affairs had more devoted service from an Honorary Secretary than that which was given to this Society by Lieut Colonel Arthur Campbell Yate'. His obituary in The Times added 'The advancement of the Central Asian Society was his ruling ambition in later years ... he was unwearied in the recruitment of both lecturers and members, and never lost an opportunity of seeking the co-operation of anyone who had been associated with travel, adventure or diplomacy in the wide regions covered by the proceedings of the Society.' Yate himself, when praised for his endeavours, would shrug his shoulders and say, 'I undertook to do the thing and when I do that, I do not let myself fail if possible.'

Arthur Campbell Yate

Lieut Colonel Arthur Campbell Yate's Bookplate

Yate's achievement belongs to the next chapter. But it may be said here that he had the foresight to see that the war had introduced Asia to many thousands of men and women who would not otherwise have gone to that continent. The trick was to get them to join the Society on their return and, as he wrote, 'thus bring double grist to the Society's mill: the grist of brain to the lecture field and the grist of funds for the production and maintenance of a Central Asian Journal, such as the Society may regard with pride.' Perhaps even Yate would have been surprised at the results of his labours.

FROM LEAN YEARS TO GOLDEN YEARS 1920–1939

The fact is we want members, we want strength, we want money, otherwise we cannot carry on.

Lieut Colonel A. C. Yate, Hon. Sec., 1920

What I may call in these days of film stars the Society's glamorous period . . . a list of Presidents with whom every schoolboy should be familiar.

Sir Edward Penton, Jubilee retrospective

We now reach a turning point in the history of the Society – from a time when the Society was struggling for its very existence to a period of steady growth, optimism and fulfilment when many of its most interesting and memorable characters joined. Some told of their experiences and adventures during the Great War, others of their explorations after it. Several gave their services to the Society as its Honorary Officers.

Penton and Yate, supported by Lord Carnock, concentrated on their recruiting campaign. Both the RGS and RAS were asked to circulate leaflets about the Society, and Centres of Asian Studies in British universities were successfully lobbied for recruits. In June 1920 Yate was able to announce a 70 per cent increase in membership: 'The old school of Central Asians know quite well that a new era has commenced and welcome to their ranks the younger generation who have problems to face which differ essentially from those which were the framework of what was known for a good half century as the Asian Question.'

In 1921 the membership had climbed to 415, more than doubling its numbers in just twelve months. 'The Society now numbers amongst its members two Secretaries of State and the pick of great administrators and soldiers of the Empire and also the elite of that younger generation which holds the future destinies of that Empire in our hands . . . Our Journals record the ability, prowess, courage, resource and endurance of men, and occasionally of women, who are an example and incentive to those who will come after them.' By 1922 the Society had nearly 600 members, of whom 143 had overseas addresses – 68 in India – and 25 were, separately, Asian members. The membership was top-heavy in senior military ranks with 3 Field Marshals and 37 Generals. It also included the Duke of Devonshire and Winston Churchill, who joined in 1921 when he was Secretary of State for the Colonies.

In April 1920 Mr H. St J. B. Philby was elected to Council. Impatient to get back to the Arab World he resigned after only five months having found a position under Sir Percy

MR. PHILBY'S GRIEVANCE

MR St. John Philby's lecture at Burlington House to the Royal Central Asian Society on his latest explorations in Southern Arabia generated, I hear, an atmosphere of liveliness unusual at a meeting of a learned society.

After commenting rather severely on the inadequate surveillance exercised by the British authorities over the hinterland of the Aden Protectorate, Mr Philby criticised Lt.-Col. M.C. Lake, the Political Secretary, who at the time was Acting-Governor.

When Mr Philby reached the Indian Ocean he informed the Residency in Aden of his presence, asking also for spare motor parts. The parts were sent. At the same time he had an official reminder from Col. Lake that he had acted contrary to the regulations in entering Shabwa without the permission of the British Government.

Mr Philby's diffuse but uncompromising condemnation of Col. Lake's attitude caused restiveness in the hall. This was finally voiced by Sir Percy Sykes, who rose and declared, amid applause, that the lecturer should know better than to use such language.

Upon this Sir Denison Ross, the chairman, who had been following the lecture, which was illustrated with lantern slides, from the body of the hall, returned to the platform.

Saying that it was time for him to remind everybody that he was arbiter of the proceedings, which he would now bring to an end, he declared that the British authorities in Aden were all honourable men and that Mr Philby was an explorer of genius. The resulting clash might therefore, in his opinion, be considered discreditable to neither party.

This diplomatic enforcement of the closure enabled the members to adjourn for refreshment in a spirit of détente.

... and his 'grievance'

Cox in Iraq. Philby was one of the Society's most colourful if provocative characters. Although he remained a member until his death in September 1960, more than once he threatened to resign, complaining that everyone running it was 'too old'. His place on Council was taken by Captain Geoffrey Stephenson and in April 1921 Yate enrolled him as joint Honorary Secretary. As Yate lived in Shropshire he felt it useful to have a London-based assistant. The choice marked almost as important a milestone in the history of the Society as the appointment of Yate himself. After serving as a French and German interpreter with the BEF in France in 1915, Stephenson was transferred to Mesopotamia to work under Sir Arnold Wilson and subsequently as Agent in London for the Mesopotamian administration. In later life he retired to live in a wooden bungalow on Lock Island, Marlow. A delightfully eccentric bachelor, he was in the habit of smoking his pipe whilst swimming in the Thames. A current member of the Society, Colonel Tom Walcot, was Geoffrey Stephenson's ward and from 1948 lived with him in that bungalow. Walcot recalls life there and how he would quite often telephone the railway station to hold the 'Marlow Donkey', the local train, for when his guardian travelled to London for Society, and other, meetings. Stephenson maintained his interest in the Society until his early eighties when he was still an Honorary Vice President.

Geoffrey Stephenson

As Sir Edward Penton remarked after Yate's death, he and Stephenson would walk daily round St James's Square with a bundle of banker's orders and would compel everyone they met interested in the East to sign up at the nearest lamppost. They made the United Service Club yield its quota of great soldiers and would then go across the road and recruit distinguished pro-consuls at the Athenaeum. Yate would say: 'Whenever I am brought into touch with people interested in Asia I speak or write to them; about eighty per cent then join' – and looking at his audience he would add: 'Go and do thou likewise.' Between them they recruited 300 new members in just two years and by the time Stephenson retired from his position in 1927 he had the satisfaction of seeing the membership reach the long-desired figure of a thousand. He had recruited 400 members off his own bat, a hundred in a single year, Winston Churchill amongst them.

Council itself continued to think up new recruiting ideas such as sending a free copy of the Journal 'to all Members of Parliament who might be considered imperially inclined'. One of the problems faced was the large number of losses from both resignations and deaths, some through such unlikely incidents as being mauled by a tiger! Although the subscription was still only one pound many members resigned on being posted or leaving for some assignment abroad, often to rejoin later. Another problem was the rival attraction of the Persian Society and the recently inaugurated Near and Middle East Association.

Yate was not in good health when he took on the position of Honorary Secretary in 1919 at the age of sixty-six. By 1923 he was seriously ill and was forced to resign. He died six years later. On his retirement the Society thanked him for his outstanding work and presented him with a silver-mounted mazer hardwood drinking-bowl as a token of its appreciation.<sup>1</sup> Yate's place as Honorary Secretary was taken by Lieut General Sir Raleigh Egerton, whose army career had been spent mostly in India, including a period as ADC to the Governor of the Punjab.

The loss of Yate in 1923 was compounded by that of Lord Carnock the same year, having completed a five-year term as Chairman which had seen the Society's membership grow from 130 to 700, an increase which the AGM was informed that year 'has enabled us to carry on rather than put up the shutters'. Carnock was replaced for a year by Sir Maurice de Bunsen<sup>2</sup> before Viscount Peel, who had just relinquished his post as Secretary of State for India, took over in 1924. An original member of the Society, Peel became President two years later on the death of Lord Curzon, the title no longer being labelled 'Honorary'. He returned to the India Office in 1928 while still holding the Presidency.

There were further changes in the Honorary Secretaries. The pattern was now established where there would be two, and sometimes three, covering differing geographical areas. Egerton, too busy with his Service charities, was replaced briefly by Major General Sir William Thompson and then more substantively in 1926 by Major General Sir William Beynon, who held the position for six years. Beynon, a well-decorated soldier, had been Staff Officer to Colonel Kelly during the celebrated forced march to relieve the Chitral garrison in 1895, and subsequently served with Younghusband in Tibet. After further service in Somaliland, Europe and Afghanistan he joined the Royal Observer Corps in the Second World War at the age of seventy-seven.

Major General Sir William Beynon

Meanwhile Stephenson's position was eventually taken by Mr Emanuel Gull, whose career had been in the Chinese Customs Service, during which he had travelled extensively in Mongolia and the Gobi desert.<sup>3</sup>

On Peel's elevation to the Presidency in 1926 his place as Chairman was taken for a year by Sir Michael O'Dwyer, a former Lieutenant Governor of the Punjab.<sup>4</sup> He was succeeded in 1927 by Field Marshal Viscount Allenby, who in 1930 was also elevated to the Presidency. Allenby's nine years in office, both as Chairman and later (1930) as President, saw some of the most important events in the Society's history. During these years the Society received its Royal Charter and, appropriately, the Lawrence of Arabia Memorial Medal was inaugurated. Allenby was in harness almost to the time of his death in 1936 when members subscribed to the fund for ex-servicemen opened in his memory.

Field Marshal Viscount Allenby

Lord Lloyd of Dolobran succeeded Allenby as Chairman and President. Lloyd was in Cairo with Colonel Gilbert Clayton and T. E. Lawrence, and later on Allenby's Intelligence Staff. Towards the end of that war he was appointed Governor of Bombay. He then resumed his career in Parliament before following Allenby as High Commissioner in Egypt. A born imperialist, Lloyd loved the pomp and circumstance of high office, his last being that of Secretary of State for the Colonies. He gave eleven years' service to the Society as Chairman and President, finally relinquishing the latter post in 1941.

Meanwhile Sir Horace Rumbold, a diplomat who had served in Persia, Japan and Turkey, took over the Chairmanship from Lloyd for three years. He in turn was replaced by Field Marshal Lord Chetwode, who had served as a Corps Commander under Allenby in Palestine and later as Commander-in-Chief in India.<sup>5</sup>

Beynon retired in 1932 and was replaced by Brigadier General Sir Percy Sykes, who did more for the Society in its middle years than anyone. He held office for thirteen years and was the mainstay of the Society during the Second World War, giving lectures at short notice when speakers at that time were hard to find. The details of his life are given in the chapter on the medal inaugurated in his memory.

Perhaps because of the Society's prestigious office holders, the membership continued to climb steadily. By 1930 it had reached 1,300, and in 1939 with Sykes and Gull now in their eighth year as joint Honorary Secretaries (a team similar to that of Yate and Stephenson), 1,800. At this time there were 502 overseas members, of whom 130 were in India, 83 in Iraq, 45 in Palestine, Syria and Jordan, 38 in Persia, 18 in Arabia and 31 in the United States. There were relatively few living in the Far East: 12 in China, 5 in Burma and 1 each in Singapore and Malaya.

The increase in membership meant a greater workload for the Secretary. In 1921 Miss M. N. Kennedy, a niece of the Society's founder Dr Cotterell Tupp, had taken over from Miss Hughes. The Secretaries worked 'in that little box on the third floor of 74 Grosvenor Street from where hundreds of letters, circulars and Journals are despatched all over the world'. Their conditions were relieved somewhat the following year when the Persia Society, which occupied larger rooms within the RAS building, agreed to an exchange. But the need for yet larger accommodation remained pressing until the Society secured its own premises, independent of the RAS, at nearby 77 Grosvenor Street in 1929. Here there was a room large enough for board meetings and another for use as a reading-room. Eight years later the Society was warned that the building was shortly to be demolished, which precipitated a move to 8 Clarges Street where there was space for the Society's embryonic library. The additional expense entailed in the move was made possible by generous donations from an American member, Mr Charles Crane.

All these problems had overtaxed Miss Kennedy and in January 1937 she was ordered to take six months unpaid leave and given £100 towards travelling expenses for a Middle East study tour. Her place was taken, temporarily, by Miss Rachel Wingate, sister of Orde Wingate who was later to gain fame as the Chindit leader in Burma. On Miss Kennedy's return, Rachel Wingate stayed on to help, eventually taking over as Secretary in 1944. When Miss Kennedy retired that year she could look back on twenty-four years of outstanding service. Sir John Shea, a later President, recalled: 'Never was a society better or more effectively served ... If anybody came back from abroad and could possibly conduct a lecture she was waiting either at Waterloo or Tilbury to catch him.'

Another important change in Honorary Officers occurred in 1939 when Sir Edward Penton was forced by pressure of government work to retire from his post as Honorary Treasurer. He had served the Society non-stop for thirty-eight years. His place was taken by Major Edward Ainger, a former cavalry officer and army interpreter in Russian and Japanese. He held the position almost until his death thirty-seven years later. These long terms of office were essential for the Society's 'tribal memory'.

Another innovation in this period was the creation of local Honorary Secretaries abroad, whose role was to propagate information about the Society and encourage recruitment. By 1939 there were such representatives in Syria, Iraq (both Baghdad and the RAF base), Egypt, and the NWFP of India.

The Persia Society

The Central Asian Society (CAS), ever mindful to increase its membership, kept an eye open for suitable amalgamations, or better absorptions, of other like-minded societies which had an interest in Asia. In 1921 it turned down an overture from the Anglo-Russian Society as being unsuitable, but considered making an approach to the Japan and China Societies. In 1923 the question of a merger with the Persia Society was discussed but it was decided to wait until the latter became the supplicant. In 1929 it did, realising it could no longer survive on its own.

The Persia Society was founded in 1911 by Lord Lamington, Mr H. F. B. Lynch and Professor E. G. Browne.<sup>6</sup> It was supported by the Persian Legation, whose Minister became, ex-officio, its Honorary President. The Society's aims were to promote sympathy between the peoples of Britain and Persia through personal intercourse, the study of Persian literature, and the promotion of joint interests in the fields of arts, science, industry, economics and education.

In 1929 the Persia Society had some 250 members, many of whom also belonged to the CAS. In the event, with resignations, the net gain of new members was only 83. The Persia Society's funds, about £375, were placed in a separate trust administered by a special committee, most of whom were old Persia hands.

There was a problem over the name of the amalgamated Society. Most CAS members of Council felt the Persia Society should expire gracefully. However, its original members, foremost amongst whom was Sir Arnold Wilson, did not want to see the title 'Persia' disappear. After animated debate and an Emergency General Meeting, when the suggestion 'Asian Society' was rejected as being too close to that of the Royal Asiatic Society, the formula 'The Central Asian Society in which is incorporated the Persia Society' was decided upon. The Persian Minister in London became an Honorary Vice President of the amalgamated Society, Lord Lamington (an early member of the CAS) a Vice President, and the two Honorary Secretaries of the Persia Society joined Council.

In theory all should have worked well but the older members of the Persia Society, not least Lord Lamington, were loath to lose their total independence. They insisted on the funds remaining separate and used for financing such events as a yearly lecture on Persia, an occasional dinner, support for archaeological projects through the Gertrude Bell Memorial Fund, and the purchase of books on Persia for the Library. In July 1934 the funds were used for a 'Firdausi Millenary Luncheon' at the House of Lords. Anthony Eden, then Lord Privy Seal, who had taken a degree in Oriental languages at Oxford, was the guest speaker. The Persian Minister, presiding, was so impressed by Eden's erudition that he described him as 'a mesmerizing personality, with all the attributes of youth, beauty and eloquence. He knows, moreover, a great deal about the East, its literature and culture.' The Aga Khan was also present and spoke.

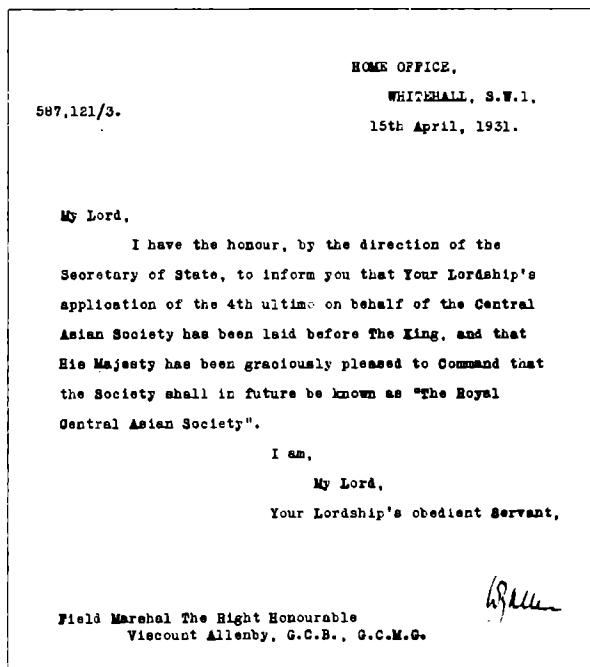

The additional title was eventually quietly dropped for everyday use as being too cumbersome. But the problem of the separate fund account continued for another thirty years, involving much legalistic argument. The Society's Treasurer, Ainger, wanted to incorporate this money into his main account, one reason being that in 1936 the Society had reworded its Charter so that it was recognised as a Charity, thus entitling it to a refund of tax. The Persia Society, before amalgamation, had made no such provision. This was resolved in 1946 by making the Society Trustees of the Persia Fund, but the account remained separate until the 1960s.

The Iran Society, which had no direct genesis in the Persia Society, was established in 1935. In 1953, when its membership stood at over 100, of whom 59 were members of the Royal Central Asian Society (RCAS), there was an experimental affiliation between the two Societies. This was prompted by Dr Moussadeq's nationalisation of the Iranian oil industry and the consequent break in diplomatic relations in 1952. Thereupon the Iran Society suspended its activities and sought a temporary alliance in the RCAS, whilst retaining its own identity. With the restoration of relations in 1954 the Iran Society was able to resume its activities and went its own way again. However, in 1967 it asked the RCAS to undertake, for a fee, its secretarial work. This situation remains though the Societies function separately.

The Society's Royal Charter and Coat of Arms

In May 1921 the Duke of Connaught was asked if he would be the Society's Patron. He was unable to accept. On 4 March 1931 the Society, under the Presidency of Viscount Allenby, aimed higher and applied for a Royal Charter. This was granted by King George V on 15 April of the same year when the Society was renamed the Royal Central Asian Society. In February 1937 the Palace confirmed that the Charter held good indefinitely without the need for a further application on the accession of a new Sovereign.

In June 1933 the Society decided that this honour should be commemorated by a Coat of Arms, a crest and a motto. The choice of the horns of the Marco Polo Sheep, or Ovis Poli Ammon, as the Society's crest has its origins in 1930. In June that year Sir Percy Sykes presented the Society with the horns and head of an Ovis Poli which he had shot in the Pamirs in 1915. He said at the time that should the Society ever adopt an emblem this would be the most fitting, being the representative game of the very heart of Asia. He quoted Marco Polo: 'One ascends so high that they say it is the highest place in the world. It is called Pamier [sic] ... There are wild sheep of very great size. Their horns reach a length of quite six spans.' This is the first known description of the celebrated animal, which bears his name. A member of the Society, the Italian explorer Sir Filippo de Filippi, also wrote at the time: 'The Ovis Poli is as much the heraldic beast of Central Asia as the white bear is to the Arctic or the lion to Africa.'

Having decided upon the horns as the Society's emblem, Sir Percy Sykes wrote to Lady Roberts, widow of Field Marshal Lord Roberts of Kandahar, to ask if the head in the possession of her late husband could be used as the design artist's model. This head, with its record span of 75 inches, was given to Lord Roberts by the Amir of Afghanistan. Lady Roberts agreed. The motto chosen to appear beneath the emblem was Cornua levat super Terras, loosely translated as 'He raises his horns over the Roof of the World'.

The Coat of Arms incorporated those from the shields of the Society's President, Viscount Allenby of Megiddo and Felixstowe and of its Chairman, Lord Lloyd of Dolobran. A member of the Society, Mr Omar Ramsden, offered his services in preparing the necessary designs and working drawings of the shield. A fund was opened to cover the fee of £50 required by the College of Arms. The response was generous and the final sum raised was over £120. The surplus was used to institute a Golden Book, whose purpose was to record the great events and names of the officers of the Society. In 1934 Sir Percy Sykes wrote: 'It is hoped that this will be of interest to present members and be of especial interest to the generation which will celebrate the Centenary of the Society in October 2001.' Tragically, that Golden Book and the original Coat of Arms were destroyed by enemy action during the Second World War. In June 1945 an application was made for the renewal of the Grant of Arms and a new Golden Book was established.

In 1944 Field Marshal Viscount Wavell, then Viceroy of India, a member since 1934 and at the time a Vice President, informed the Society that he was sending it a pair of Ovis Poli horns. This fine pair, with a span of 70½ inches, thought to be the fourth largest recorded, had been given to Lieut Colonel E. H. Cobb, Political Agent at Gilgit, at the latter's request, by the Amban (magistrate) of Tashkurgan, Mr Wang Ying-Chu'an, in 1943. The head had been found in the Kukturuk Valley of the Taghdumbash Pamir and it was believed the twelve-year-old ram had been killed by wolves.<sup>7</sup> The horns of the head were similar to those of Lord Roberts's animal used as the model for the Society's emblem. Colonel Cobb sent the head on to the Viceroy in Delhi with the proposal that he should present it to the Society. It eventually arrived from India in July 1945, shipped by Messrs Thomas Cook for £2. Customs valued the head at £100 and wanted £10 in dues but after argument this was waived. The taxidermist firm of Roland Ward cleaned and mounted the head, though the skin mask itself was so badly decayed that it had to be mounted as a skeletal exhibit. This is the pair of horns currently displayed in the Society's Library. It was exhibited at the International Big Game Fair at Düsseldorf in 1954.

In 1955 Lieut Colonel Cobb wrote: 'It is not surprising that our crest and motto should excite our admiration and stir our imaginations. If we may think of the achievement of this Society since its foundation and of its ever-increasing scope, are we not also tempted to think that Marco Polo's sheep still looks down from High Asia upon the world with the destinies of the great civilizations of Western Nations, Great Russia and China's millions, supported in the weight and balance of those massive horns?'

In March 1956 the Society was offered the head that had belonged to Lord Roberts but had to decline it for lack of space. In April 1968 a member, Dr Howard Harper, offered to send from Kabul another set of Ovis Poli horns. This again had to be declined. And finally in January 1975 Lord Lovat let it be known he was most anxious to buy, on behalf of the Shikar Club, the pair of horns presented by Viscount Wavell at their market value. Council rejected the offer!

The Assyrian Problem

Throughout its history the Society has never been slow to interest itself in the political issues of the day and to highlight the cases of people or communities perceived to be the victims of injustice or mistreatment, the more so in its earlier years when it felt it had political influence.

The plight of the Assyrian Christians, or Nestorians, exercised the Society during the 1920s and 1930s and was the subject of some thirteen lectures and several articles during this period.<sup>8</sup> The Assyrians had sided with the Russians and turned against their Ottoman overlords in the 1914–1918 war. With the collapse of Tsarist Russia in 1918 they turned to the British who encouraged those tribesmen living in the mountains north of the Mosul Vilayat to rise against the Ottoman Turks. The rebellion failed. After the resulting massacre those who had escaped sought protection with the British forces in Persia. With the fall of Baghdad to the British they were transferred to a nearby refugee camp and after the armistice became a minority problem in Iraq.

The Assyrians had a rightful claim to British gratitude. During the war they had been known as ‘Britain’s smallest ally’ and after it their flag appeared with those of the other allies at the Cenotaph.<sup>9</sup> They gave loyal support during the post-war mandatory period. Many enlisted in the locally-raised Levies and generally allied themselves to the British cause. As a result they became estranged from the Arab and Kurdish communities and in 1933 there were further massacres. The problem was handed to the United Nations for a solution with a suggestion that they should be moved out of Iraq and later, in 1939, 12,000 were resettled in Syria.

In 1933 the Assyrian Patriarch, the Mar Shimun, joined the Society. In 1934, Sir Percy Sykes, the Honorary Secretary, was asked to look into the Assyrian question and wrote to the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Sir John Simon, on behalf of the Society, enclosing a copy of his own recent article on the subject in the Journal.<sup>10</sup> He suggested, inter alia, that the Assyrians should be resettled in Eastern Canada, adding that the Mar Shimun agreed. Sir Percy concluded his letter: ‘It is difficult to see how they can be secured the treatment they undoubtedly merit outside of the British Empire.’ A sympathetic reply was received from Simon mentioning that Brazil was another possibility.<sup>11</sup>

In his Annual Dinner speech in 1934 Lord Lloyd said: ‘We have had several lectures on the Assyrian problem and I do not believe there is anyone in this country who is aught but ashamed and unhappy at the fate of a minority for whose welfare we are completely and admittedly responsible . . . Their very espousal of our cause in the war made it impossible for them to live in their homeland save under our guarantee – and we have failed them.’ In 1936 the Archbishop of Canterbury used the Society’s Journal pages to raise funds for the Assyrians’ plight, reminding readers they were the Nestorians of antiquity. Two members, Major D. B. Thompson and Captain G. Gracey,<sup>12</sup> were especially active in their refugee camps and Miss Kennedy, the Society’s Secretary, during her six-month study tour of the Middle East, reported to Council on the unsatisfactory state of that at Khabbur. Another member, Major A. D. W. Bentinck, who had served for a year with the Assyrian Levies, was a prolific lecturer on their history and plight.

The problem of the Assyrians dragged on into the mid-1940s when they were again recruited into the locally-raised Levies to provide guards for the Habbaniya airbase. This was a vital role at that period of the mandate: most of the British army had been withdrawn and it was left to the RAF to maintain the peace. But again there were problems. In 1944 a meeting of interested parties was held at the Society’s offices and in 1953 the English-educated Assyrian Patriarch, Mar Eschai Shimun, lectured to the Society on the current situation regarding his widely dispersed people.<sup>13</sup>

Palestine

Another subject that received attention was Palestine, which at the time was under the British mandate. There were twenty-seven lectures and Journal articles during the period under review. (Surprisingly only seven were given during the years 1940–1960 when the State of Israel was being created.) The Society has always claimed neutrality in political debate. With regard to Palestine its reputation can best be attested by the fact that during the Mandate there were among its members some of the Husseini family and leading Jewish advocates of the Zionist cause. Sheikh Hafiz Wahba, Saudi Arabian ambassador to London, the Iranian ambassador and the Israeli ministers in Washington and London were all members, many of them of long standing. The lecture programme was thus well balanced, giving opportunity for both the Zionists and the Arabs to give their points of view. Dr Chaim Weizmann gave two separate lectures presenting the Zionist case and a number of Palestinian Arabs including Jemal Bey Al Husseini, Fakhri Bey Nashashibi, and Miss Nabiha Nasir gave theirs. Other lecturers were given by British administrators, whilst the Chair at meetings was taken by Members of Council such as Sir Ronald Storrs and Sir Horace Rumbold, who had deep experience of the country.

After the speakers had made their opening addresses many of the lectures took the form of a discussion with members from the floor joining in at times animated debate. Again there was a balance between the pro-Zionists arguing that Zionist immigration brought benefit to the country as a whole, and the Arabs expressing concern at their loss of lands and identity. At Fakhri Nashashibi's talk on The Arab Position in Palestine, when Storrs took the Chair, the lecturer pointed out that if Britain gave support to the unlimited immigration of Jews then the Arabs would find it difficult to support Britain's imperial interests – and vice versa. Both the Muslim scholar Mr Marmaduke Pickthall and the Arabist Mr St J. Philby spoke from the floor. Mr Archer Cust, both in his own lecture and from the floor in others, pressed his case for cantonisation. The guest speaker at the Annual Dinner in 1937 was Lieut Colonel Sir John Chancellor, a former High Commissioner in Palestine. Both he and Sir Horace Rumbold spoke for the Arab cause. In April 1939 the Society convened a special discussion group at its offices to study the latest Palestine proposals.<sup>14</sup> At the Annual Dinner that year the guest speaker was the Rt Hon. Malcolm MacDonald, Secretary of State for the Colonies. His portfolio included responsibility for Palestine and he devoted virtually the whole of his speech to the growing problems there. The writer and broadcaster, Mr Nevill Barbour, was a valued interpreter of Arab Affairs until his death in 1973, as was the Arab writer Mr George Antonius. Lectures on the Palestine issue continue to the present. In April of the Centenary year Mr Afif Safieh, Palestinian General Delegate to the United Kingdom, spoke on What has happened to the Middle East Peace Process?

These subjects apart, the lecture programme in this period roamed far and wide – for some too wide. Members made no complaint about talks on Albania and Tunisia. But in 1922 a lecture entitled The Cape to Cairo Railway from the point of view of African Development drew criticism as being just too far outside the Society's remit.

The Society's explorers returned to tell their tales. Mr Bertram Thomas and Mr H. St J. B. Philby lectured on their crossings of the Empty Quarter and then exchanged acrimonious (though possibly tongue-in-cheek) correspondence in the Journal over the spelling of place names, for example Wabar/Ubar and its exact location. Praise was heaped upon them at the Annual Dinner speeches stressing the prestige they brought the Society. Other travel lectures were given by Sir Eric Teichman, Peter Fleming and Ella Maillart. Sir Aurel Stein spoke at the Annual Dinner in 1929 and two years later the Society sent him a telegram of support when he was facing bureaucratic obstruction in China. Captain Frank Kingdon Ward, the explorer and plant collector, delivered seven talks in this period.

Sir Aurel Stein

There were three consecutive lectures on Wahhabism given in 1929–1930, the first by the Saudi Arabian envoy Sheikh Hafiz Wahba. There were more talks on railways, the Society claiming that 'Railway enterprises in Persia is a subject that CAS has made its own', and subsequently some on Air Routes. Lectures on internal India remained a problem, though the Society reached an agreement with the East India Association that they could be given 'jointly'. Some lectures had alluring titles – The Freeing of Russian Slaves at Khiva; Sport on the Snow Line; With the Calipers on the Roof of the World and The Reindeer Tungus of Manchuria.

Many of the lectures, such as those by Major General Dunsterville on his Caspian mission; Lieut Colonel F. M. Bailey on his adventures in Central Asia; Sir Arnold Wilson on the future of Asia and Mrs Rosita Forbes on the Senussi of North Africa, proved so popular that members had to be turned away at the door through lack of space. Having no lecture premises of its own the Society used, variously, those of the Royal Society and the Royal Astronomical Society, both in the Burlington House complex, the RUSI in Whitehall and the Royal Society of Arts in John Adam Street.

Dinners took place annually, either at the Victoria and Cecil Hotels, Claridges or Grosvenor House. In 1923 the price was raised to 11/6d. Lord Curzon presided in 1924 and gave a memorable speech, extolling the appeal of Central Asia: 'the appeal to the spirit of service and duty more than any corresponding area of the globe. ... [which] holds us by the magnificence of its surroundings and by the splendour of its surface.' But he also welcomed unreservedly the wide remit the Society had now adopted. At the Silver Jubilee Dinner in 1926 the Presidents of both the RGS and RAS were welcomed as guests. In his 1927 dinner speech, Field Marshal Lord Plumer suggested to his audience that when young officers came on leave from parts of Asia, worn by the discomforts of government service in exacting conditions, members of the Society should endeavour to show them some private hospitality, such as 'weekends in the country, fishing and shooting parties and dinners in London with a play to follow': a splendid reminder of a more leisured age.

Viscount Allenby, on assuming the Presidency from Lord Peel in 1930, reminded the Society that it still had a political role by quoting from a speech made by Sir Francis Younghusband in 1910. 'It is not sound business to be continually at the mercy of events ... Events can be largely foreseen and if troubles are coming they can be provided for by those who know the countries and their peoples.' Allenby enlarged: 'We who have served in the East have all suffered because this dictum was not heeded. ... If this Society can make known the judgements of the men who know best what should be done; if we can save our Eastern dependencies and friends from legislation passed by politicians with their eyes directed towards voters, instead of honest considerations of the questions in hand ...

then we shall surely have done something to help our countrymen who are working under such great difficulties.'

The Amir Saud, Crown Prince of Saudi Arabia, attended the dinners in 1935 and 1937. He made short speeches in Arabic, which were translated by Sir Ronald Storrs and Mr Mahmood Zada of the Saudi Legation. Mr Philby complained to Council that a small piece of bacon had been served with the quail at the 1935 dinner. Claridges were most apologetic.

Over the years speeches at the Annual Dinners have entertained as well as informed. In 1925 Mr Leopold Amery, Secretary of State for the Colonies, told of how thirty years earlier he and the Earl of Birkenhead had been travelling in a remote part of Asia Minor. Benighted in the wild mountains their only refuge lay in a hut occupied by some villainous-looking brigands. Awakening from a deep sleep he heard one of the outlaws say: 'Let's kill the little one first.' Recognising himself as the victim he fumbled for his revolver, realising just in time it was a question of which chicken was to be sacrificed for the breakfast of the visitors.

In 1990 Mr Shaharyar Khan, High Commissioner for Pakistan, related how an Ambassador to one of the monarchies of Europe was rehearsed on how to present his letter of credentials. The moment the horse-drawn coach stopped he was to alight, bow three times and say to the Marshal: 'Allow me to present my letter to His Majesty.' On the day the coach was held up by traffic. Thinking he had arrived the Ambassador acted as he had been instructed. Bowing in the precincts of a fish and chip shop the owner telephoned the police to say that a lunatic had escaped. Meanwhile the coach arrived at the Palace empty.

Dinners apart, there were a number of receptions held in the period: in March 1928 for the ladies of the Society to meet the Queen of Afghanistan; in June 1936 for the Sheikh of Bahrein, Hamid bin Isa Al Khalifa; in May 1937 one was held for the Amir Abdullah of Jordan, and in April of the following year one for the Sultan of Muscat and Oman, Saeed bin Taimur. He was described afterwards as 'shrewd and energetic and speaking excellent English'.

By the close of the period the Treasurer's accumulated balance sheet had risen from a modest £200 in 1919 to £2,000. Salaries had risen to £450, Journal expenses to £695 and the annual rent of the office to £250. Even the telephone costs had grown from £2 to £13! Investments and cash assets stood at £685 and the separate Persia Fund at £354. In 1932 Life Membership was fixed at 15 guineas. Amazingly, the annual subscription had remained at £1 since the inception of the Society. In 1928 there was a proposal to raise it but because of the economic situation this was abandoned. In 1939 it was raised to 25/- for new members. Existing members were asked to pay the same if they could; 243 did so. Everyone was encouraged to take out a covenant, but the threat of war discouraged people from committing themselves.

So passed what many considered to have been the golden years or, as Sir Edward Penton put it in his retrospective at the Golden Jubilee Dinner, 'The Society's glamorous period ... with a list of Presidents with whose names every schoolboy should be familiar.' A period when its members included some of Britain's leading explorers who returned to tell the Society of their discoveries and when the Society felt it still had sufficient influence to write to Secretaries of State – some members had previously held their posts. There were others, no less distinguished, such as missionaries, doctors, scholars, archaeologists and engineers and these have been detailed in a separate chapter. The war and the gradual dismemberment of Empire inevitably pushed the Society in a different direction, as we shall see.

When war did break out in September 1939 the Chairman, Field Marshal Lord Chetwode, girded his military loins and in Churchillian mode issued a notice to all members: 'The wickedest war in history has come upon us; we are fighting a cunning man and an evil mode of life. We are the leaders of the world in the struggle for everything we think worth living for and we have no choice but to see the thing through to the end, and in the end we shall win ... Let us keep a high heart and a good courage, believe no rumours and do, each one of us, what we can to help, knowing well we never offered service in a better cause and one which must triumph.'

FROM EMPIRE AND BACK TO TRADE 1940–1959

In ten years time there will be few, if any, administrators joining our Society . . . we can expect the principal connection we shall have with Asian countries will be where we began – trade.

Earl of Scarbrough, Annual Dinner, 1959

With a strong military component on the Council, described as ‘looking like a page from the Army List’, the Society faced the War with a determination to proceed as near to normal as possible. Even at the height of the blitz the lecture programme was maintained, though timings were arranged so that no one need be out after dark. Only the Annual Dinners and meetings of the Dinner Club were suspended.

In November 1940 Field Marshal Sir Philip Chetwode, busy running the War Organisation of the British Red Cross, was replaced by another robust soldier, General Sir John Shea. Coincidentally, both officers had served under Allenby in Palestine, Shea receiving the surrender of Jerusalem in December 1917. Shea’s early military service had been in India, taking part in the relief of Chitral in 1895, and after the First World War he returned there. He was the ideal Chairman during the War; at the height of the London bombing he never missed a meeting. It was largely due to his example that the Society continued to function and produce its Journal in those difficult years.

One of Field Marshal Chetwode’s last duties was to write to another Field Marshal, the Finnish statesman, soldier and Central Asian traveller, the Baron Carl Gustav von Mannerheim, who had been a member of the Society since 1928. Mannerheim’s great feat was to ride from Osh, in Southern Kyrghizia, and then across Sinkiang and China to Kalgan north of Peking. A journey of 14,000 kilometres, it took two entire years, from 1906–1908, to complete.<sup>1</sup> As a young officer Mannerheim had served in the Russian army and taken part in the Russo-Japanese war. His Chinese journey, ostensibly part of an archaeological mission, had been sanctioned by the General Staff in St Petersburg and was in reality as much to collect military information as to pursue Mannerheim’s own anthropological and philological interests. His achievement ensured promotion in the Russian army, but in 1918 he led the Finnish resistance against the Bolsheviks, and against Russia herself in 1939. He later became his country's President. The Society now offered Mannerheim Honorary Life Membership, a gesture of respect for that gallant military leadership as much as for his Central Asian endeavours.

The war caused a problem in recruitment. Many members resigned, especially when posted abroad. This had a serious effect on the Society's finances; the overheads had still to be paid. A circular urged everyone to do their utmost to bring in more members and as a recruiting incentive the joining fee was waived for those in the armed services and the Merchant Navy. Another recruiting aid was the circulation of the Journal, together with an introductory letter, to Officers' Messes and Military Hospitals. As a result of these measures, the steady loss of members was halted. By the end of the war membership stood at 1,672, compared with 1,827 at its start. Sir Percy Sykes prophesied that after the war, as had occurred in 1918, those who had for the first time experienced Asia would join and the membership would soon reach two thousand. Although that figure was never achieved it was not too far off.

The Caxton Hall Incident

Early in the war, though unconnected with it, one of the most extraordinary, yet largely forgotten, incidents in the history of the Society took place. On 13 March 1940 at a joint meeting of the Society and the East India Association, Sir Percy Sykes, the Honorary Secretary, spoke on Afghanistan: The Present Position. The other speakers, all distinguished members of the Society, were Sir Michael O'Dwyer, a former Chairman, Lord Lamington, Sir Louis Dane and Lord Zetland. As the meeting drew to a close a member of the audience, an Indian Sikh, Udham Singh, walked to the front of the hall and fired six shots from a large-calibre revolver, killing Sir Michael O'Dwyer and injuring Lamington, Dane and Zetland. Fatalities might have been greater had Udham not been using thirty-year-old cartridges.

As the assassin sought to escape from the Hall several of the elderly members present shouted for him to be stopped. Miss Bertha Herring, a volunteer wartime ambulance driver and long-serving member of the Society, then in her sixties, with great presence of mind put out her foot causing Udham to stumble. Upon this she, Captain Binstead, Mr Claude Riches and Flight Lieutenant W. V. Emanuel all pinned the murderer to the floor, whilst Miss Mary Rowlatt ran into the street to find a policeman. Meanwhile, three doctors present, Colonel C. H. Reinhold, IMS, Dr M. R. Lawrence (a brother of T. E. Lawrence) and Dr Grace Mackinnon gave aid to the wounded. Miss Herring was awarded an MBE for her action. Those other members mentioned received letters of appreciation from the Council.

There is not space here to enlarge upon the incident, its aftermath and causes. These issues have been covered elsewhere.<sup>2</sup> Suffice it to mention that Udham Singh as a young man had been wounded at the Jallianwala Bagh massacre at Amritsar on 13 April 1919. Along with other Sikhs in the Punjab, he had held O'Dwyer as much responsible for the incident as Brigadier General Dyer himself. Dyer, also a member of the Society, had died in 1927. O'Dwyer, Lieutenant Governor of the Punjab at the time of the massacre, had condoned Dyer's action and subsequently defended him against charges of brutality. Though that may have been sufficient reason for wanting to seek revenge on the British administrators, whom Udham blamed for the incident, there are some strange twists and turns to the story, such as his contact with revolutionary leaders in Britain, including the IRA. The Scotland Yard file on the incident has been closed until 2016 and the Home Office one to 2040. This has led to speculation that since arriving in England in 1934 and adopting an alias, Udham may have been used by the security services in some way.

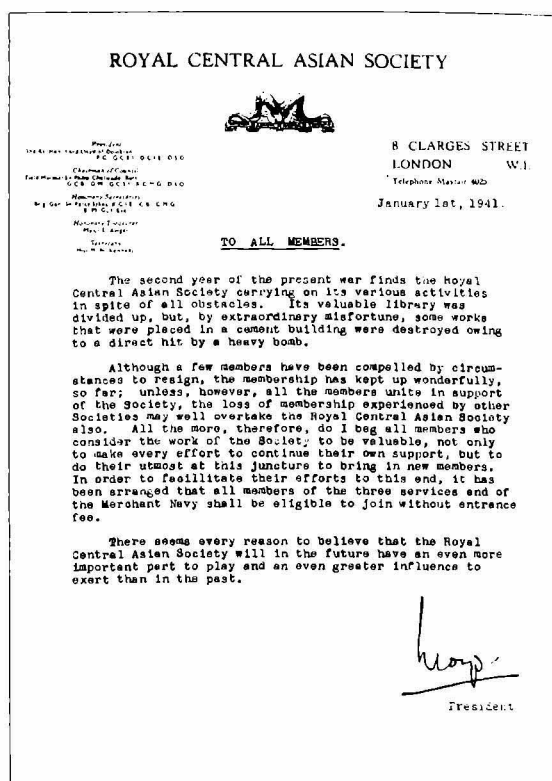

Udham Singh was speedily brought to trial on 4 June of the same year, found guilty and sentenced to death. In the aftermath of Dunkirk and the need for maximum support from Indian servicemen, the press was discouraged from making him appear as any sort of martyr. As a result of pressure from the Indian government, his body was exhumed from Pentonville Prison in July 1974 and returned first to Delhi and thence, in triumph, to Amritsar and on to his birthplace at Sunam. His portrait adorns the museums of both the Bagh and the Golden Temple with the inscription The Great Revolutionary Shahid Udham Singh who shot O'Dwyer, the butcher of Jallianwala Bagh and embraced martyrdom.

Another shock befell the Society early in the war. At its outbreak, the more valuable books of the Library were farmed out to the homes of members living in the country, while the remainder were placed in the cellars of the offices at Clarges Street. But the most rare volumes, together with the Society's Coat of Arms, its 'Golden Book', collected treasures, archives, pictures and only complete set of Journals, were placed in the cellars of its printers, Billing and Sons Limited, at Guildford. On 27 September 1940 a direct bomb hit, perhaps aimed at the nearby railway junction, started a fire and none of the Society's items was salvaged. In January 1941 a letter from the President to all members informed them of the October event but stressed that the Society was carrying on its various activities in spite of all obstacles. By way of encouragement it concluded: 'There seems every reason to believe that the Royal Central Asian Society will in future have an even more important part to play and an even greater influence to exert than in the past.'

It was not long before the lectures were concerned with the war itself and how it would affect Asian countries in its aftermath. There were several on these themes about China, then an ally, Russia, the Middle East and the Arabs, Japan, Thailand, the Philippines, neutral Turkey, the Indian Army and even Mongolia. Whilst there seem to be no members alive today who were present at Caxton Hall, there are some who do remember those wartime lectures. Mrs Eileen Humphreys, capturing the spirit of the time, recalls the Chairman, General Sir John Shea 'resplendent in uniform and using his monocle to good effect introducing the speaker. Some of the talks centred on the conduct of the war; they were of absorbing interest. But from time to time we were glad to escape from the realities and the tedium of the continuing conflict and look back to happier times. Among the regulars in the audience was an elderly lady who used to sit in the front and do her khaki-coloured knitting, in aid, no doubt, of the war effort. On one of these days, after the speaker had sat down, the Chairman called for contributions from the floor and this lady spoke about her life in the East. She described the narrow alley where she lived in the shadow of a mosque. The Mullah was a baker and each morning, having summoned the faithful from the four quarters of the city to prayer, he would turn towards her house and enquire in a loud voice "and how much bread will you have today?"

In 1941 the President, Lord Lloyd, died suddenly. His place was taken by Lord Hailey, described as 'the greatest Indian civilian since the Mutiny'. His offices in India had included Commissioner in Delhi and Governor of both the Punjab and United Provinces. There was a change in Honorary Secretaries the following year with Colonel Stewart Newcombe replacing Emanuel Gull to assist Sir Percy Sykes. Newcombe became another of the Society's notable stalwarts. Readers of T. E. Lawrence's Seven Pillars of Wisdom will be familiar with his name. An engineer officer, he had spent ten years in the Egyptian army before joining the Sherifian forces in the Hejaz, where he became a close associate of Lawrence. He was captured by the Turks and sent as a prisoner to Turkey. His escape was aided by the daughter of the prison governor who later became his wife. A member, Sir Denis Wright, first met Newcombe in 1929 when, as a schoolboy, he was on holiday in France. After the war Newcombe recruited him to the Society and persuaded him to lecture. Sir Denis recalls Newcombe as modest, quiet and never speaking of his adventures.

Lord Hailey

These appointments coincided with the Society's involvement in a series of measures to aid the welfare of Muslims in Britain. In 1940 both Lord Zetland and Lord Lloyd had been among the senior officials who had given approval for the building of the London Mosque and it was Lloyd who had gathered leading Muslims together with the Egyptian Ambassador to finalise it.<sup>3</sup> Sir Hassan Suhrawardy and other members of the Mosque Committee were present at the Society's Dinner that year when the Egyptian Ambassador was able to announce its inauguration, though the start of building was delayed for fear of war damage. The Society's involvement aided the government's decision to make a grant of £100,000 towards the project.

Council next considered how Iraqi and other Asian students, who were in Britain at the invitation of the British Council, could be made temporary members of the Society. A sub-committee, led by Newcombe and aided by Lieut Colonel Gerald de Gaury when he was in Britain, was formed to deal with these issues. Working through the Islamic Cultural Centre in East London and similar centres elsewhere in the country, it gave advice to local authorities regarding the provision of mosques and religious education. In particular the committee was concerned about the welfare of Muslim seamen, most of whom were Indian or Yemeni Arabs. Lodging for Indian seamen in London was a disgrace, the problem being compounded by war damage. Conditions were little better in Glasgow and Liverpool. The committee liaised with the Mission to Seamen, the British Sailors Society (run by a retired Admiral turned priest), the Royal Alfred Merchant Seamen's Institute and the British Indian Steam Navigation Company. Though the Society's concerns were genuine, no doubt any government support via the Ministry of Labour was influenced by the need to maintain Muslim good faith and co-operation, especially in India, at this crucial period of the war.

In 1944 Miss Kennedy retired as Secretary. In gratitude for her long service, the members contributed £800 as a retirement present. Her place was taken by Miss Rachel Wingate, who had acted as part-time assistant to Miss Kennedy since 1935. Rachel Wingate, sister of the famous Chindit leader Orde Wingate, was an Oriental scholar and Central Asian traveller of repute. She came from Indian Army stock and crowned a university education with a Tripos in Arabic and Persian before becoming Assistant Librarian at SOAS. Deeply religious, in 1924 she joined the Swedish Mission in Chinese Turkestan, riding over seven high passes to get there. Four and a half years later she rode back, a lone European, along a different route. On return home she produced the first Turki-English dictionary. This was followed by two years living in Jerusalem and two more in Beirut, where she acquired a love for Palestine and, like her brother, a sympathy for Zionism. Her wide knowledge of Asia helped her find suitable lecturers and enabled her to produce the Society's Journal.

At the close of the Second World War the Society reflected on its losses. From 1940 the meetings had listened sadly to the growing roll of those killed or wounded in action, a total of some two hundred at its end. Exact figures were difficult to come by, for in addition to those known, sixty-four members disappeared from the lists as untraceable. Some had possibly been prisoners of war and on return had failed to get back in touch.

It would be both invidious and lengthy to make even brief reference to all the Society's distinguished members who died in action. However, mention should be made of one. Lieut Colonel Sir Arnold Wilson joined the Society in 1920, became an active member of Council and the leading activist of the rump of the Persia Society on its amalgamation in 1929. Iran and Mesopotamia were his loves; he served in the latter throughout the First World War and at its end was appointed Acting Civil Commissioner. His methods drew critics, both Arab and British, one of whom was T. E. Lawrence. Not surprisingly, Wilson was, in turn, critical of Lawrence's methods, rather than the man, and of the Arab Bureau in general.<sup>4</sup> Wilson was unreservedly brave; as his Journal obituarist wrote: 'He was the sort of man who must be in it if there was danger ahead and urgent work to be done.' He joined the Royal Air Force at the age of fifty-six and died in its service as a Pilot Officer air-gunner. There is a certain irony in the fact that these two protagonists, Lawrence and Wilson, after distinguished careers, both joined the RAF with junior ranks; Lawrence in peace, Wilson in war.

On Sykes's death in 1945 Newcombe assumed the main role of Honorary Secretary. He was supported now by Lieut General H. G. Martin, who had served in the Afghan War of 1919, subsequently in India and Europe and on retirement as Military Correspondent for the Daily Telegraph. And, maintaining the geographical Far East balance, by Sir John Pratt, who had served as a diplomat in China and who was replaced two years later by Mr Oswald White.

In 1947 there were important changes in both the Presidency and Chair. Field Marshal Viscount Wavell replaced Lord Hailey as President. He had been a member since 1934 and in 1943 was made an Honorary Vice President to fill the gap left by Younghusband, 'it being felt by Council it would be useful to have the Indian Viceroy in that position'. The same year General Sir John Shea handed the Chairmanship to Lieut General Sir Adrian Carton de Wiart, VC, KBE, CB, CMG, DSO, one of the bravest and most decorated officers in the British army. It was said that he had left bits of himself on almost every battlefield in the last half century. The Society continued to be drawn on for counsel. On the independence of India and Pakistan in 1947 there was concern as to the future of the India Office Library and Records. Would those two countries lay a claim and the collection be split? A government committee was set up under Sir David Monteath, a former Under Secretary of State for India, to decide what should be done. In early 1948 the Society, asked for its advice, held two special meetings of Council to debate the issue. The advice proffered was that the library must be kept together and housed in London, ideally under a Special Board of Trustees formed from representatives of the UK, Indian and Pakistani governments. If this was not possible, it should be transferred to the School of Oriental and African Studies, part of London University, but not placed in the British Museum or in some other University.

Letter from Wavell accepting the Presidency

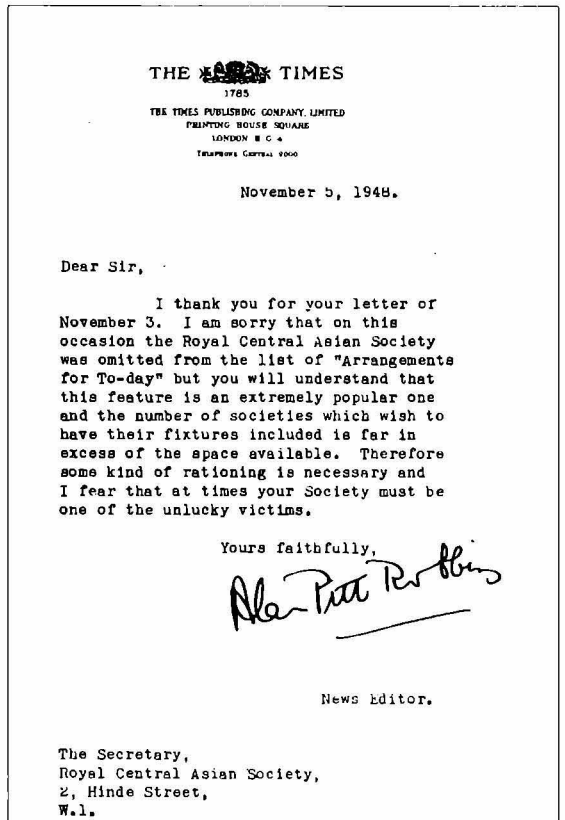

In 1946 the owners of the premises at Clarges Street required a three-fold increase in annual rent. This resulted in a move to No. 2 Hinde Street, Manchester Square, sharing with the Palestine Exploration Fund. The move entailed additional expense and to stave off a financial crisis a new recruiting drive was embarked upon. A circular in 1947 was perhaps badly worded: 'The Council welcomes applications for membership from those whose work, studies or war service may lie in one of the countries of Central Asia and Western Asia in which the Society is interested.' The remit described was vague: many potential recruits felt they had no connection with 'Central Asia'. The slogan adopted at the AGM of 1949 was 'Recruit more members or die'. Banks and oil companies involved in Asia were requested to advertise the Society in their in-house magazines, and both The Times and the BBC were asked to mention the Society's lectures in their news bulletins. By 1950, as a result of these measures, membership had picked up, reaching 1,750.

The post-war lecture programme had a somewhat different complexion from the previous five years. There was, for example, an explosion of lectures on China, traditionally the preserve of the China Society, probably because that country had been an ally in the war. And the period saw a growth of lectures on the oil industry, commerce and economics in general. But Afghanistan continued to be popular and there were several talks on Egypt, and even the Sudan. The Society could never divorce political and Islamic trends in Egypt from those in Asia because of the communicable trends from one to the other.

There were lectures still on suspicions of Russian intentions; for example, Russia in Asia and Some Notes on Russian Intrigue in Tibet. Travel in Soviet Central Asia at this period was not easy, but in 1946 Mr Jan

Drohojowski spoke on A War-Time Journey through Central Asia; Eric Downton on From Alma Ata to Bokhara: Impressions of Soviet Central Asia and Madame Jean Ullen de Schooten on Tribes of Central Asia. In the mid-1950s, Miss Daphne Park used her position in the Embassy in Moscow to visit and photograph Khiva, Samarkand, Bokhara and Merv. Though just fifty years since those romantic escapades of Bailey and Blacker, perhaps not so much had changed. Most of the locals were still wearing a form of native dress. Sir Fitzroy Maclean managed a nostalgic return and told the Society about it in My Visit to Central Asia 1958.

... still wore a form of native dress ... Street scene in Khiva, 1955 [Baroness Park]

Other explorers and travellers told of their experiences in different areas. Mr Wilfred Thesiger spoke on The Badu of Southern Arabia and The Ma'dan or Marsh Dwellers of Southern Iraq. Others went to Arabia on quests of husbandry such as Mr V. H. W. Dowson – To Arabia in Search of Date-Palm Offshoots. Mlle Ella Maillart spoke, in French (as did others), on Le Tibet et La Chine. The mountaineer Colonel W. H. Tilman travelled through Sinkiang and the neighbouring Afghan corridor and lectured on Wakhan or How to vary a Route and Miss Freya Stark, a long established lecturer of the Society, on From Tarsus to Lake Van.

There were further changes in senior officers before the Society's important Golden Jubilee year. After the sudden death of Viscount Wavell in 1950, General Sir John Shea returned, this time as President. He needs no further introduction. In the same year General Carton de Wiart retired as Chairman 'in order to pursue other interests', one of which may have been his second marriage at the age of seventy. His place was taken by Admiral Sir Howard Kelly, who had served as Commander-in-Chief of the China Station from 1931 to 1933 and was recalled to active service in the Second World War as the British Naval representative in Turkey. He died in office and his place was taken by another sailor – a change after a line of soldiers had dominated the post – Admiral Sir Cecil Harcourt. After service in the Mediterranean he received the surrender of the Japanese in Hong Kong, remaining there as virtual governor until 1946.

There were further changes in the Honorary Secretaries. In 1949 Mr W. H. (Harold) Ingrams took the place of Colonel Newcombe. He is best remembered for his years as Resident in the Hadhramaut. In 1950 Colonel H. W. Tobin replaced Lieut General Martin covering the Central Asian remit. A mountaineer, he served on the Joint Himalayan Committee which sponsored the 1953 Everest Expedition.

In 1958 Group Captain H. St C. Smallwood replaced Oswald White as the Far East member of the team, later becoming its leading member and serving in this capacity for seventeen years. The success of the Society over this period owes much to his devotion. 'Chips' Smallwood's career was remarkable and is worth recounting in some detail as it exemplifies the wealth of experience the Honorary Officers brought to their posts. In 1901 he joined the Imperial Yeomanry seeing service in South Africa, transferring there to the Transvaal Horse Artillery. In 1907 he was employed by a firm in Burma where he enlisted in the Burma Mounted Rifles. At the outbreak of the First World War he joined the Bengal Lancers, seeing service in Mesopotamia. In 1916 he was seconded to the Royal Flying Corps and, in the Second World War, to the Royal Air Force with postings in India, Burma and China. Between the two wars he was in China and Mongolia as Aeronautical Adviser to the Chinese government, where he organised the first air route from Peking to Ulan Bator. On retiring from the RAF he joined the Royal Observer Corps, resigning from that at the age of seventy-eight! His service to the armed forces of the Empire and Commonwealth extended over sixty years under six sovereigns. He contributed a number of articles to learned journals and lectured widely. He died in his eighty-fifth year. His memory will long be cherished by the Society of which he was a devoted member and where he was known as 'best loved of Honorary Secretaries'. Two others who joined that team for short periods were Mr J. M. Cook and Colonel G. M. Routh.

The range of the Society's Local Honorary Secretaries continued to expand. By 1960 there were representatives in the NWFP of Pakistan, Lahore, Ankara, Damascus, Beirut, Baghdad, Bahrain, Kuwait, Qatar, Khartoum, Hong Kong, Washington and Eastern Canada.

Honorary Officers apart there were many distinguished members who served on the Council during the period under review, who gave equally valuable service. Space allows only a brief mention of four to exemplify this.

Sir Kinahan Cornwallis joined the Society in 1920. During the First World War he served as Director of the Arab Bureau in Cairo and then as a Political Officer in Syria. In 1921 he accompanied the Amir Feisal to his new throne in Iraq. Remaining there as an adviser, he was one of the principal architects of the modern state of Iraq. He returned to that country in April 1941, having to leave the Council to do so. He brought to the Society enormous experience and wisdom regarding the Arab world.

Brigadier Stephen Longrigg also joined in 1920 and stayed on in Iraq after service there in the First World War. Like Cornwallis, he had served in the newly-formed government under the British Mandate, holding the post of Inspector General of Revenue. After its termination he joined the Iraq Petroleum Company, leaving during the Second World War to serve as a Brigadier in the Civil Affairs Branch of GHQ Middle East, responsible for administering the former Italian Colonies. Following the war he devoted much of his time to the Society where he was able to bring not only experience of the Middle East, but of the oil industry also. In all a distinguished scholar, linguist, writer and lecturer and a worthy holder of the Lawrence of Arabia Memorial Medal.

C. J. Edmonds, known as 'Eddy', was another who worked under the British Mandate in Iraq after previous service in the Levant Consular Service. In 1922 he found his spiritual home in Kurdistan and ever since remained a leading authority on that country. He succeeded Cornwallis as adviser to the Iraqi Ministry of Interior in 1935, retiring in 1949 to devote himself once more to his true vocation of promoting Kurdish nationhood and language, lecturing widely on the subject. His obituarist described him as typical of the last of his breed: 'the Englishman who gave the best of himself to those of another race and culture'. His affable nature made him a popular and beneficial member of the Society. He was a holder of the Sir Percy Sykes Memorial Medal.

Lieut Colonel Geoffrey Wheeler joined the Society in 1923. After service in Europe in the First World War he transferred to the Indian Army. Most of his subsequent posts were in Intelligence appointments: between 1919 and 1925 in Turkey, Malta and Palestine and then as Military Attaché in Meshed. He returned to India in 1931 and in 1940, seconded to the External Affairs Department, he organised and directed a Foreign Propaganda Division. In 1946 he was sent to Iran at the request of the Foreign Office and carried out similar work at the Embassy in Teheran. In 1953 he founded the Central Asian Research Centre, which has since maintained close links with the Society, and edited its magazine Central Asian Review. He became the Society's, and perhaps the country's, leading expert on post-war developments in Soviet Central Asia and represented the Society at the International Congresses of Orientalists. He remained dedicated to his subject and the Society until his death in 1990 aged ninety-two, sixty-seven years as a member. He was also a Sykes Medal holder.

The Annual Dinners resumed in 1947. In 1949 the Arabian explorer Wilfred Thesiger was a guest and in 1953 Brigadier Sir John Hunt, a member since 1921, was given a standing ovation to acknowledge his successful Everest expedition. The following year he was presented with the Lawrence of Arabia Memorial Medal in recognition of that achievement.

The Society's Golden Jubilee was celebrated at Claridges on 11 October 1951. (The eleventh was chosen arbitrarily, the exact date having been lost in the destruction of the archives.) Two hundred members and their guests attended. Earl Mountbatten of Burma, invited as guest of honour, cancelled hours before the start due to a severe bout of influenza. The Earl of Scarbrough and the Reverend Canon C. B. Martlock, Honorary Secretary of the Palestine Exploration Society, in whose premises the Society was housed, were the other invited speakers. There were at this time three of the Society's original members still alive, Sir Edward Penton, Lord Zetland and Colonel J. Woolrych Perowne. In the event only Penton was able to attend and made a memorable speech recalling the founding years, which was drawn upon in the opening chapter.

The theme of the Jubilee Dinner was more one of self-congratulation on the successful position that the Society had now attained, with a record membership of 1,861, than a realisation that it had reached something of a watershed. That was left to Presidential speeches at forthcoming dinners in the decade, when it was pointed out that in terms of membership and thus inevitably of its activities, a turn in direction was unavoidable. The first hint of such a change had come as far back as 1946 when at the AGM the President, Lord Hailey, pointed out that the war had brought Asian countries to the attention of a public who previously knew of them only as names. With a changing relationship from an imperial to a cultural one, the Society would increasingly be more concerned with the latter. It would also have to give more attention to economic developments in Asia. In 1948 the Treasurer, Edward Ainger, warned Council that during the next ten years there had to be a change in the character of the Society to attract substantial income through extended membership of commercial firms working in Asia. Already nearly two hundred members were employed in oil companies and an increasing number of young members were going out East as engineers or in business.

In 1953 the Chairman, Admiral Sir Cecil Harcourt, said: 'Up to a short time ago a large proportion of our membership and higher officers of the Society sprang from the great administrative services in Asia. Our members included ex-Viceroy, Provincial governors and so forth . . . that source has now ceased . . . A large proportion of our Society live and work in Asia and the greater part of them now are representatives of our big commercial undertakings.'<sup>5</sup> In 1956, for the first time, the guest speaker at the Annual Dinner, Lord Godber, Chairman of Shell, was a leading figure in the oil industry. Harcourt repeated his previous theme adding: 'Now members who go to work in Asian countries are on the staffs of our great industries, including oil and engineering. These industries have recognised the work done by the RCAS and have helped us by means of finance and other encouragements.' In 1959 the Earl of Scarbrough put it more bluntly: 'In ten years time there will be few, if any, administrators joining our Society . . . we can expect the principal connections we shall have with Asian countries will be where we began – trade. And it is to the younger members of our great firms, which do business in the East, that the Society will be useful.' It was no real innovation: the first lecture on the subject Our Commercial Policy in the East was delivered in December 1903 by General E. F. Chapman. All this was a long cry from 1921 when the Society proudly boasted it had 'the elite of that younger generation which holds the future destinies of Empire in our hands', and when it sent free copies of the Journal 'to all members of Parliament who might be considered imperially inclined'.

Whilst thematically those statements made at the dinners in the 1950s were true, they failed to recognise that even if administrators no longer ruled and 'trade was of the essence', a large proportion of the Society was still coming from members of the Diplomatic Service, the remnants of the Colonial Service, the British Council and members of the armed services either stationed in Asia, or as loan personnel helping to build emerging forces there. All of these services provided a continuing source of membership.

Euphoria over the Jubilee period also hid the fact that the Society was on the point of facing its worst financial crisis yet. At a Council meeting in February 1952 the Treasurer warned that there was a danger of imminent bankruptcy. A circular signed by the three Honorary Secretaries was sent immediately to all members. While pointing out that the membership was being sustained, the Society was facing greatly enhanced expenditure in the cost of producing the Journal and paying its staff 'a rise in whose salaries was long overdue'. An increase in subscriptions was considered but meanwhile: 'If in the Jubilee year each member would recruit one or more members most of our financial troubles would be solved . . . The question that everyone has to ask himself, or herself, is whether any institution of which he is a member is worthy of continued support . . . If Britain herself is to survive as a great country she must have continued and increasing relationships with the Asian continent; and the Royal Central Asian Society provides an essential and irreplaceable means to this end.'

In June of the same year the subscriptions were raised; to £2 p.a. for members resident in London and within 50 miles of Charing Cross and £1.10s for country and overseas members. Remarkably, in fifty years the membership subscription had risen by only £1! This action was followed by an appeal to sixty-nine firms working in Asia. Those that responded resulted in a gain of £913. This strategy continued for the next ten years and by 1962 had resulted in a total of £10,056. Despite this bankruptcy scare, by the end of 1959 the balance sheet was in the black once more.

In 1953, amidst all this activity, Miss Rachel Wingate the Society's capable secretary died suddenly as a result of complications following a common cold. She had given twenty-eight years of service to the Society. Her place was taken by Mrs K. G. Putnam. Like her predecessor Mrs Putnam had had an interesting Asian career. She joined the WAAC, under age, straight from school in the First World War. After marriage to Lieut Colonel W. A. Putnam, she lived in India for over fifteen years, taking opportunities to trek in the Himalayas. In 1942 after her husband was killed in the Middle East commanding a battalion of the 14th Punjab Regiment, she returned to India to join the WAC. In charge of the Casualty Directorate at GHQ, she rose to the equivalent rank of Lieut Colonel and was awarded the MBE. Her picture, painted by Simon Elwes, hung in the WAC Mess at Delhi until 1946 when it was presented to her on departure. She served as the Society's Secretary until 1960 when she was forced to retire on grounds of ill health.

In 1955 the Earl of Scarbrough replaced General Sir John Shea as President. He had devoted a large part of his life to India, including six years as Governor of Bombay, before becoming its Secretary of State in London. He is perhaps best known for the Scarbrough report concerning Oriental Studies in Britain. In 1957 Sir Hugh Dow replaced Sir Cecil Harcourt as Chairman. Dow was an Indian Civil Servant, crowning his career with appointments as Governor of Sind and Bihar and after leaving India as Consul General in Jerusalem. He was succeeded in 1959 by Sir Philip Southwell. His career being in the oil industry, he was the first 'non-establishment' figure to hold the position since Valentine Chirol in 1907.

The Earl of Scarbrough

At the end of this period the Treasurer was again beginning to deal with some serious figures. The accumulated balance sheet stood at £13,000; salaries now accounted for £1,680, the rent of premises £201 – the cleaning and upkeep of which cost £260 – and the telephone bill had risen to £28. The largest single item was the cost of producing the Journal, now £1,527.

We can close this chapter with a vignette showing the continued vitality, and indeed good humour, of the Society. In September 1958 the redoubtable Honorary Secretary, Group Captain 'Chips' Smallwood, then aged seventy-five, was visiting a remote part of Western Mongolia with Dr Charles Bawden of SOAS, a Mongolian scholar and himself later a member of Council. They were, to the best of their knowledge, the only two Englishmen in that country. Visiting an archaeological dig at Kiltgen, under Czech and Mongolian supervision, they were invited into a nearby yurt. Toward the end of the meal one of those present lifted his Chinese bowl full of Russian champagne and said in broken English that he wished to propose the health of the English Queen, whom he admired greatly. Translated into Mongolian the toast was enthusiastically joined by all present. Thereupon Smallwood sent a telegram to Her Majesty informing her of such loyal sentiment in far-off Asia. This story encapsulates the spirit of the Society. It has a Royal Patron and there is no part of Asia to which members do not penetrate. It also demonstrates the friendship which the Society endeavours to promote between Britain and the peoples of that great continent.

Sir Edward Penton closed his Jubilee retrospective speech by speaking about the second half of the Society's century. 'The road will be the same, the method will differ. We may not get the flow of distinguished and experienced members from the same source as hitherto. But that does not mean that there are not thousands of people who are necessarily interested in the area we cover. On the contrary, the sources are possibly less restricted today. From these our membership must be drawn: residents in the countries which already correspond with us; visitors travelling for information who will want to tell the Society what they have found; businessmen who trade in Central Asia (as interpreted by the Society) and, above all, the politicians who need such a repository of knowledge.' We can now turn to see how the Society did fare in the next forty years.

SETTLING TO A BALANCE

1960–2001

There is a balance in our affairs we must always bear in mind. It is the balance between the cultural, historical and archaeological content on the one hand and the current affairs content on the other.

Sir Arthur de la Mare, Chairman, AGM, 1981

We now enter an extended period when the 'Great Game' has long since gone, the Empire gone and some would argue the day of seminal exploration also gone. Members no longer returned from India to become its Secretary of State in London. Indeed, few in government had the sort of expertise that could point out, as did Sir Olaf Caroe, that President Yahya of Pakistan was not a Pathan, as commonly reported, but a Qizilbash. The days of the plenipotentiary were all but finished, the mandarin in Whitehall now acted on his own whim. Sir Esler Denning, Chairman, posed the question at his dinner speech in 1967: 'The Society was founded sixty years ago when the British Empire was still at its zenith . . . it would be legitimate to ask whether today it is a declining relic of our imperial past or whether it is a living organism with a part to play in the day and age in which we now live.' He answered it: 'I suggest it is the second which is the truth.'

More than ever there was a need for a repository of knowledge about Asia that could be made available to those who needed it. The Society could supply that better perhaps than any other organisation. As the new Chairman, Sir William Dickson, pointed out, the Society now had a more enhanced role than in the past when there was no lack of statesmen and administrators in the East to keep its problems in everyone's mind. Most had now come home and there was thus a danger of a serious ignorance about the area among the current generation. This viewpoint was reinforced by Lord Home in 1977: 'Your Society exists and is composed of individuals who have known Asia, who have lived in Asia, and who have traded in Asia and who understand what significance Asia holds for the rest of the world . . . We shall need to rely on that kind of experience more and more as political and diplomatic knowledge of that continent becomes scantier. An ounce of experience in these matters is worth one ton of theory.'

As noted at the close of the last chapter, the Society would ignore interest in trade, and links with those doing business in Asia, at its peril. But this did not mean that it was turning into some sort of mercantile advisory organisation. On the contrary, as will be seen by the end of this chapter, its vitality over a broad range of subjects and activities remains as great as ever. To quote Sir William Dickson again: 'Today our contacts are less and less through government and more and more through the medium of business and trade. We have, nevertheless, a full appreciation of the importance of language, literature, art, history, religion, antiquities and customs. How often is it not necessary to understand these if we are to understand the peoples of which they form a part? But the Society had to adapt, not only to abide by its charter but in order to survive. Like similar societies, some of which were forced to 'put up their shutters', there were hard times ahead. Economic realities and the changing interests of a younger generation meant an inevitable drop in membership with concomitant financial anxieties.

In 1960 Marshal of the Royal Air Force Sir William Dickson replaced the Earl of Scarbrough as President. After service as a pilot on the North West Frontier during the First World War, in the Second he rose to become C-in-C of the Middle East Air Force and after it Chief of the Defence Staff. The following year, General Sir Richard Gale succeeded Sir Philip Southwell as Chairman. He had been a member of the Society since 1931. After the First World War, Sir Richard spent eighteen years in India, where he took part in several Himalayan climbing expeditions; in the Second he is best remembered for his role in training and commanding airborne forces. He was recalled from retirement to succeed Lord Montgomery as Deputy Supreme Allied Commander in Europe. Renowned for his bluff exterior, inside lay a kindly soul.

In 1961 Mr Colin Rees Jenkins succeeded Colonel Routh as Honorary Secretary, serving for twenty years. His background, useful at this stage of the Society's development, was in the oil industry, his career culminating as a Director of Shell-Mex. In the same year Miss Margaret Marsh became the new Secretary. Like her two predecessors, she had an Asian career behind her. Born in Shanghai, after schooling in Europe she returned there as a secretary in the Consulate General during the Sino-Japanese hostilities. In 1940 she was commissioned into the ATS holding various staff appointments in the Middle East, and after the war in South East Asia. In 1957 she transferred to the Foreign Office retiring to take on the Secretaryship of the Society where she was known, not unkindly, as 'the Colonel'.

In 1960 the Palestine Exploration Fund, under whose roof the Society was lodging, unashamedly increased its rent to gain more money for its own activities. That increase could not be met and again the question of an amalgamation was discussed. The Royal Asiatic Society (RAS) was the obvious choice but that proving impracticable, others were considered: the Iran Society, the Anglo-Malayan, the Anglo-Arab and the Anglo-Iraqi among them. But the RCAS was supra-national and nervous about the nationalistic attitude of these one-nation organisations.

The problem of accommodation unresolved, in July 1961, the Society's Diamond Jubilee year, an experimental afternoon tea party was held at the Hurlingham Club to which members of the Anglo-Iraqi, Anglo-Arab and China Societies were invited. It was an opportunity to get to know each other should any amalgamation take place. Tickets cost 10/- while the charge for car parking was £5. Over three hundred members of the four societies attended and the Saloon Band of the Royal Air Force played. The occasion became a permanent feature, though after 1965 the venue was moved to the Terrace of the House of Lords, for RCAS members only.

In 1961 the Society found new premises at 12 Orange Street off the Haymarket. Its congested office space, poor approach and general dingy air scarcely gave the right image to the new commercial firms the Society was hoping to attract and the lease was cut short. Meanwhile, Council began to implement a policy that would both attract and benefit those large firms, which later became known as 'Corporate Members'. Some became generous and valuable benefactors.

Leaflets describing the Society's activities were sent to organisations engaged in banking and shipping, to the Middle East Association and the London Chamber of Commerce. The prevailing recession curtailed the outcome: 6 firms had joined by 1965, 22 by 1975 and in 2000 the number stood at 31. The benefits to the 'Corporates' were the increased number of lectures dealing with topics of interest, and the influential speakers at the Society's Annual Dinners. These included Ministers of Trade, Bank of England Governors, Chairmen of Oil Companies and large organisations trading in Asia. In addition there were similar speakers, together with serving and retired ambassadors, at the confidential Dinner Club (an adjunct of the Society covered in Chapter XI) and special luncheons for Corporate Members to meet ambassadors from Asian countries.

Sir William Dickson's speeches set the theme for the coming period. The lecture programme and the Society's activities settled to a balance. The past was not ignored for it was the way to understand the future, but current affairs, economics and trade gained a new importance. As early as 1963 from a total of 22 lectures in the year, 5 were on trade and economics and 5 on current affairs. The base from which lecturers were drawn changed also. The range had always been wide: administrators, diplomats, international civil servants, architects, soldiers, schoolmasters, churchmen and missionaries, museum staff, explorers, travellers, broadcasters and scientists. This continued, but increasingly there were more academics and scholars (in 1981 six out of eighteen speakers came from faculties of Asian studies in British universities), reliable journalists, businessmen and authors, most of whom were younger people. Council was keen to get Asians to speak and the Foreign Office and British Council were asked to look out for likely candidates coming to Britain.

Mr Shaharyar M. Khan, High Commissioner for Pakistan in London, guest speaker at the Annual Dinner in 1990, commented that 'the Society has the most wonderful list of lecturers that I know of ... doing an amazing job to extend the frontiers of knowledge for people interested in Asia. The range of talks each year is remarkable.' That was true. In 1965, for example, individual countries covered were China, the Gulf States, Israel, Pakistan, Mongolia, India, Malaysia, Burma, Ceylon, Uzbekistan and Afghanistan. Juxtaposed in each year's programme was a wide spectrum of subjects ranging from Japanese Industry, Persian Society under the Qajars and Israel's Search for Identity to Mongolian Wild Flowers, Arabian Date Cultivation and Working Elephants in South India. Despite the drive to have more lectures on current affairs and economics, the Honorary Secretary in his report for 1972 had to admit, as did a predecessor in the 1920s, 'judging by audience attendances the most popular lectures are those on travel, especially if illustrated'.

In May 1965 the lecture venue moved across the courtyard of Burlington House from the rooms of the Royal Society, which since 1921 has been one of the most used premises, to those of the Society of Antiquaries, where they have been held ever since, an arrangement that is gratefully acknowledged. In 1970 evening lectures, which had been stopped during the war, were restarted, many young members having found lunchtime attendance difficult. These were held initially at the Council Chambers of the Law Society in Chancery Lane before moving to Burlington House.

In 1964 Sir Gilbert Laithwaite became Chairman. He had served in the India Office for twenty-eight years, seven of which were spent as Private Secretary to the Viceroy, and after independence as High Commissioner to Pakistan. He remained a Vice President of the Society until his death in 1986, aged ninety-four. The following year Mr Hubert Evans, a former administrator in India, and after independence an Ambassador in Korea, became an Honorary Secretary. In 1966 Miss Marsh retired as Secretary after seven energetic years; her place was taken briefly by Miss E. Kirby.

Visiting Asian scholars have always been welcomed at the Society's offices, when relevant members of the Foreign Office and British Council were invited to join them. For example, in 1960 Mr K. M. Abdullaev, an eminent geologist from Uzbekistan, met the Society's own Central Asian experts. In 1968 Dr Nirmal C. Sinha, Director of the Mangah Institute of Tibetology and Professor Dr Bazary Shirendev, President of the Mongolian Academy of Sciences, were entertained and in 1969 Dr Soewondu and Mr Saing Silalahy, Vice Governor and Deputy Mayor of Djakarta. From 1970 to 1972 there were visits from Mr Abdul Haw Waleh, an Afghan newspaper editor, Dr Seong Hi Yim of the Korean National University, General Musa Ogun, Director of Turkish Radio and Television and Dr V. N. Nikiforov, of the Institute of Eastern Studies in the USSR. An authority on Chinese history, Dr Nikiforov had an especial interest in the kidnapping of Sun Yat Sen in 1896 by the Chinese Legation in London. By coincidence that incident took place outside the very offices of the Society, then in Devonshire Street, where Dr Nikiforov was being entertained. And it was Sir James Cantlie, the father of a member, who had been instrumental in rescuing him.

The Society was less kind to Soviet officials who showed an interest in actually joining. In 1976 an application from the Russian Assistant Naval Attaché was turned down by the Society's then President, Lord Greenhill who, only five years previously when Permanent Under Secretary at the Foreign and Commonwealth Office, had expelled one hundred and five Soviet officials for spying. Nor was a Soviet member of the International Wool Council any more successful in January 1982. Just as well for, despite his persistence, shortly afterwards he was also expelled from the country. Ironically, at this period there were more than a dozen Journal subscribers in the USSR. There was, perhaps, more chivalry at the tail end of the 'Great Game' than at the height of the Cold War: in 1909 the Russian Ambassador was an invited guest at the Society's Annual Dinner.

The Society has performed some unusual roles. Perhaps none more so than when in 1965 the Honorary Secretary, Group Captain Smallwood, with the help of Mr Reginald Hibbert, a member who was then Chargé d'Affaires in Ulan Bator, was assisting the Royal Horse Guards (The Blues) to obtain a supply of yak hair for their helmets.

In 1966 the Earl of Selkirk replaced Dickson as President. An early career in the Royal Air Force was followed by various government posts, including UK Commissioner for Singapore and Commissioner General for South East Asia. He gave much of his time to the Society and was active in its affairs to within a few days of his death. He was well known for his Scottish grace, said to have been written by Robert Burns for one of his ancestors.<sup>1</sup>

In January 1967 there was a move from those unsatisfactory quarters off the Haymarket to more spacious ones at 42 Devonshire Street. That year Sir Esler Denning took over as Chairman. Joining the Japan Consular Service in 1920, he returned there as Ambassador in 1952. His understanding of the Japanese was such that a Prime Minister once complained, 'He not only understands what we say but what we think.' In 1967 Mr James Fulton became an Honorary Secretary, a post he held for twenty-five years. A former diplomat, he also brought Far Eastern experience to the Society.

Throughout the 1960s, the membership was maintained at around 1,600, dropping in the 1970s because of inflation and an inevitable increase in subscriptions. Reasons given for resignation were most often 'retired to the country', 'too many commitments', 'reduced circumstances' or 'old age'. When such distinguished and long-serving members as Field Marshal Sir Claude Auchinleck, Lieut General Sir John Bagot Glubb and the missionary doctor Sir Henry Holland claimed such plight, they were invariably offered Honorary status.

With the end of Empire as such, there was an increasing membership from the Diplomatic Service, many of whom brought similar Asian expertise as had those from the Indian Civil Service. But there appeared to some members an imbalance, especially in those serving on the Council. In 1983 the Chairman, Sir Arthur de la Mare, felt obliged to state that there was no formal connection between the two organisations 'except that our purpose which is to maintain a good understanding with and among the peoples of Asia is also the purpose of the F.C.O.'.

In 1968 Miss Marinel FitzSimons became the Society's Secretary. Aware of its existence through a Scottish Peer for whom she had worked, on return from a holiday in Sri Lanka she spotted an advertisement for the post in The Times. It was a fortunate happenstance; she remained a most effective and popular Secretary for twenty-seven years, seeing the Society through some difficult times. In 1992 the Chairman, Sir Michael Wilford, was moved to say, 'I know of no other organisation which is carried by its Secretary in the way in which Marinel carries us . . . She virtually is our Society.' In 1993 she was awarded an MBE for her work.

Sir Norman Brain had a similar career to Sir Esler Dening, whom he replaced in 1971, both in the Japan Consular Service and as Minister at the Embassy in Tokyo, before becoming Ambassador in Cambodia.<sup>2</sup> During his tenure of office an important sub-committee under Sir Robert Black, a former Governor of Singapore and Hong Kong, was appointed to look into the whole future direction of the Society. After much deliberation it concluded that the members, lecturers and Journal contributors were changing in their identity: 'The end of Empire means we can no longer call on men and women in overseas government service, with knowledge of, and ready and authoritative access to, the people, their customs, languages and cultures.' The sub-committee suggested that measures were needed to counter this. These included more social activities in connection with distinguished Asian visitors and exhibitions; the Society's financial situation required taking a further look at an amalgamation with another, or other, societies and there was a need to attract more affiliate members from amongst corporate institutions, educational as well as commercial, including Oriental Departments in European Universities. In addition a joint approach might be made with other similar societies to the government, via the Royal Society, for financial aid, or a direct approach made to a Charitable Trust.

Simultaneous with the Society's own review, the Royal Society and the British Academy were conducting their own exercise examining the financial and other problems of some three hundred learned societies. The Society appointed a liaison officer but apart from the Treasury cutting the VAT paid by such societies little else of benefit ensued.

Sir Stanley Tomlinson, who succeeded Brain as Chairman at the end of 1974, also came from a background of the Japanese Consular Service and South East Asia, before becoming High Commissioner to Sri Lanka. The following year Mr Edward Ainger was replaced as Honorary Treasurer by Mr Peter Rees. Their joint tenure coincided with one of the Society's periodic financial crises. Inflation and rising Journal costs had caused a deficit. The loyal world-wide membership once more responded to the Chairman's cri de coeur that the finances were in a 'desperate state' and the resulting donations eventually wiped out the deficit.

Change of the Society's Name

The change of the Journal's title to Asian Affairs, made in 1970, was the precursor to changing the name of the Society. A Council minute at the time noted: 'If the Society should change its name in future the title Asian Affairs should be borne in mind'. The decision to make such a change and rename the Society 'The Royal Society for Asian Affairs' (RSAA) was taken in December 1973. As we have seen, from its inception the Society's remit extended beyond the narrow confines suggested by the original title. But since the end of the war few people outside the Society understood its origins, and the narrowness suggested by its appellation was becoming a positive hindrance to recruitment, especially of those in business and academic circles who felt they had no real connection with Central Asia per se.

There were legal procedures to overcome. Application had to be made to the Charity Commissioners and the Home Office and permission sought from the Queen. This was received in October 1974 and an Emergency General Meeting was held on 10 December so that members could endorse the decision. The change became effective from 1 January 1975. Maximum publicity was sought with letters to the press, government departments, institutions and universities to the effect that the Society was interested in Asia as a whole, that it dealt with the contemporary economic, political and social developments of every country in Asia but in no way competed with the Royal Asiatic Society.

Gentlemen
I have the honour, by direction of the Secretary of State, to inform you that Her Majesty The Queen has been graciously pleased to approve the use of the title "The Royal Society for Asian Affairs" by the organisation now known as the Royal Central Asian Society.

'Dr Dennis Duncanson made a stirring speech ...'

There were, of course, renegades upset by the disappearance of this perceived romantic link with the past. When, in 1993, the Chairman, Sir Michael Wilford, said at the Annual Dinner: 'One result of the collapse of communism in Central Asia has been to bring very much more into focus our original title of the Central Asian Society – and there are indeed some renegades in the Society who feel that our new title of the RSAA is actually a step backward...', some of the audience broke into applause. Later the same year the Society's Annual Tour took place in Chinese Central Asia. A banquet was given by the Chinese in what had been the old British Consulate at Chini Bagh in Kashgar, residence of so many of the Society's famous early members. Dr Dennis Duncanson, an Honorary Secretary, made a stirring speech at this historic moment. A toast was drunk to Sir Francis Younghusband and, overcome by the nostalgia of the moment, some members proposed the old name of the Society be restored. However, such revisionist sentiments were probably made more with good humour than serious expectation.

In 1977 Lord Greenhill of Harrow, a former Head of the Diplomatic Service, became President. Apart from war service his direct experience of Asia was in Singapore. But he brought to the Society a knowledge of the Whitehall machine, sound common sense and a dry humour. He had started his working life as a railway apprentice and, like Sir Frederick Burrows an early post-war Governor of Bengal, he would say proudly he had spent more time 'shunting and hooting than hunting and shooting'. In the same year Dr Dennis Duncanson became an Honorary Secretary. His career in the Far East was involved in the fight against communist terrorists in Malaya and in Vietnam. On retirement from government service he established a Centre for South East Asian Studies at the University of Kent. Ten of his seventeen years in the post saw a happy partnership with Mr James Fulton with whom he shared a common Asian background.

In 1978 Sir Arthur de la Mare became Chairman, again with service in Japan before becoming Head of Mission in Afghanistan, Singapore and Thailand. With his inimitable jovial style he was a popular Chairman. In 1981 he recruited to the Society Mr J. F. N. (Bill) Wedge to take over as Honorary Treasurer, a post he held for fourteen years. With a career in Barclays International, during which he had travelled extensively in Asia, he was an ideal choice to see the Society through a period when the finances were again under strain. This latest problem was caused by the coming expiry of the lease on Devonshire Street, the purchase of which had entailed exhausting the Society's reserves. This time serious money was involved; at least £100,000 was required, otherwise, as the Chairman put it bluntly, 'we shall be broke and homeless'. In March 1984 an appeal circular and various fund-raising schemes were launched. An auction of members' Asian artefacts – 'look in your attics' – organised by Mr J. B. da Silva, and held at no commission by Christies, was the initial success. A world-wide approach under Mr Maurice Smith, aided by Mr Frank Steele, brought in munificent contributions from the Sultans of Oman and Brunei, an anonymous Saudi donor and Mr Ahmed Farid. Thanks to these and to the generosity of members, the target figure was reached. No doubt the Society's change of name helped; some of these donors might have asked what connection they had with Central Asia.

In 1984, in the midst of this fund-raising activity, Sir Michael Wilford took over as Chairman, holding the position for ten crucial years. He was the fifth consecutive Chairman with a Far Eastern background, ending his diplomatic service career as Ambassador to Japan. In the same year Lord Denman became the new President and remains in that position in the Society's centenary. After war service in India and the Middle East, he has been engaged in business, commerce and overseas banking, especially in the Arab world. He has been the first President to have participated actively in the Society's Asian tours.

The financial position temporarily eased, the next problem was to find fresh accommodation. Members of Council were looking actively at a variety of options, one at least in a most unsavoury area of Kings Cross! Rooms in the basement of the Travellers Club was another possibility. In the event Mr Frank Steele negotiated and secured quarters at Canning House, Belgrave Square. The move was made in December 1985 and it is where the Society remains happily housed.

In July 1986 HRH The Prince of Wales accepted the invitation to become the Society's first Patron. (A proposal to ask the King to take that position when a Royal Charter was bestowed in 1934 had been considered too precipitate.) In 1987 he was Guest of Honour at the Annual Dinner. Over four hundred members and their guests were present. Before addressing weightier issues, the Prince put his audience at ease: 'I must say that in the context of the Royal Society for Asian Affairs I am all in favour of personal contacts. I have always heard that the best way to learn a foreign language was to have a foreign mistress. To have a special society to encourage Asian Affairs, established by Royal Charter, shows particular imagination.' The Prince then dealt with the problem of the teaching of Oriental languages, referring to the recent government report of a member, Sir Peter Parker.<sup>3</sup> This was especially apt because the subject was one of the first the Society dealt with after its inception.

Canning House, 2 Belgrave Square
[c' Canning House]

The Annual Dinners continued throughout the period. The cost in 1960 was £2; in 2000 nearer £50. Coincidentally, that cost has always equated approximately the annual subscription. There was a move from the Hyde Park Hotel to the Savoy in 1972. The dinners were held in the winter which could cause problems. In 1962 there was such dense fog that forty-seven members had to cancel on the night. In 1991 the snow was so deep no trains and few buses were running and taxis were at a premium. One Council member remembers running four miles across London in black tie to greet the guest speaker. In 1998 the dinners were moved to June, close to the Annual General Meeting.

In 1982 HRH Crown Prince Hassan of Jordan as the guest speaker reminded his listeners that the leader of the Arab Revolt of 1916 was his great grandfather and added, 'I find it tragic that religion and ethnic break-up endangers the entire Middle East today.' In 1992 the Aga Khan, as guest speaker, attracted a large number of Ismailis to the dinner. The following year the Foreign Secretary, the Rt Hon. Douglas Hurd, recalling the Society's founding interests, remarked on how Central Asia itself was returning to a world of manoeuvre and intrigue conducted almost as in the days of the 'Great Game' except that the peoples of the area were now involved in their own destiny. Looking to the Society's future he saw that 'new forms of effort will require just as much energy as the Viceroy and the Consuls and the District Commissioners had to exercise in the past', but he foresaw also 'new forms of reward and new forms of satisfaction'.

In 1994 the Princess Royal impressed her listeners by her very personal account of the recent travels she had made in Mongolia, Kazakhstan, Uzbekistan and Vietnam as Patron of the Save the Children Fund. She gave a graphic account of those countries' problems in the aftermath of the Russian withdrawal. 'We need to know more about their culture and that is where the RSAA has an enormous role and influence, particularly in education.'

Relations with the Royal Asiatic Society

As we have seen, whenever the Society faced a move or a financial crisis, the possibilities of amalgamation with other societies were considered. And other societies in a like position acted similarly. In 1967 the RCAS made an offer to take over the Anglo-Mongolian Society, which was rejected. In 1973 Lord Inchcape, Deputy President of the Royal India, Pakistan, and Ceylon Society, proposed a merger 'so long as its Journal South Asian Review could be kept'. That was unacceptable. But the really serious proposals have centred, periodically, around a merger with the Royal Asiatic Society (RAS), which had been the Society's host in its formative years. When in 1929 the Society moved for the first time to its own quarters, it publicly acknowledged its 'thanks to the RAS under whose roof the Central Asian Society was fledged and for the constant kindness and the help their Secretaries have so kindly given'. At the Annual Dinner in 1935 Sir Edward MacLagan, twice President of the RAS, remarked: 'The two Societies are sisters. The RAS is by far the elder sister [it was founded in 1823] and she is, perhaps, more wrinkled, but she watches with the greatest pride the vivacity and the social success of her younger sister. She looks also, I am afraid, with great envy on the large number of her young sister's admirers. Both Societies have one object, to make the East better known to the West and vice-versa, but we go about that work in a different way.'

It was that 'different way' which in the event always thwarted an amalgamation. Sir Robert Black had written in his 1974 Review: 'The RAS is unwilling to entertain a closer association with us because the nature of their interests calls for an emphasis on a scholastic method in studying their concerns, whereas we seek to interpret the contemporary problems of our area of interest against the background of its history and culture.' However, from 1981 to 1984, and again in 1989, when the Society was facing further financial difficulties, a merger with the RAS was considered in earnest. At that latter date the President of the RAS was Mr Frank Steele, also a member of the Society and one who had been a most active member of its Council. He was sympathetic to a union; if ever there was to be one that was the time. But whilst Council saw financial advantage in the longer term, when put to the vote the majority felt strongly that the two societies were of such a different nature that a merger would devitalise them both.

In all these merger exercises the Society has always been the suppliant and the RAS, with its freehold premises and sound financial footing, has held the more advantageous position. From this standpoint an ink-stained letter unearthed in the Society's archives, written in November 1940 by the then President, Lord Lloyd, and addressed to the Secretary, appears in retrospect fanciful:

Dear Miss Kennedy

If and when the time comes for any negotiations with the Royal Asiatic Society, I do hope you will let me know. I believe that we are in the major position and that there can be no question of amalgamation on equal terms. If we handle the thing right, we can absorb the Royal Asiatic, and this is what I think we should do. . . . What we want is their building and library, if it remains standing at the end of the war.

Lord Lloyd may have felt that the Society, with a membership at the time of around 1,700, compared with less than 800 for the RAS, was in the stronger position. In 1989 the figures were more equal: the RSAA at just over 1,000, the RAS still around 800, some 300 of whom were also members of the former.

There were new Honorary Secretaries to replace the partnership of Fulton and Duncanson. In 1988 Lieut Colonel A. P. H. B. Fowle, who had served with Indian Mountain Batteries on the Frontier and instructed at the Pakistan School of Artillery at Nowshera, took the position. His service on the Council and as Honorary Secretary totalled, at the centenary, over twenty-five years. Dr Ina Russell joined him in 1993 after a career with the Board of Trade, concerned mainly with South East Asia. She was replaced in 2000 by Mrs Marilyn Hywel-Jones, who has had many years experience of Arabia following her soldier husband.

Along with similar Societies, the 1980s saw a fall in the ordinary membership and in the mid-1990s, for the first time since 1927, it was below a thousand. This caused new membership drives with letters to the Heads of Diplomatic Missions in Asian countries and to the Board of Trade; renewed contact with British universities and from the early 1990s a special effort to bring in more Junior Members. At the end of the year 2000 the membership had climbed back to 1,128.<sup>4</sup>

In 1994 Sir Donald Hawley became Chairman. After legal training he joined the Sudan Political Service, transferring to the Foreign and Commonwealth Office on independence. He bridged the Middle and Far East with Head of Mission posts in Muscat and Kuala Lumpur. In 1997 he inaugurated a five-year plan to review the Society's primary aims, increase its membership and ensure its future financial stability. He also saw the Society through its centenary celebrations.

The following year Mrs Helen McKeag replaced the long-serving Miss FitzSimons as Secretary. After two years she was succeeded by Mr David Easton, whose career in the Diplomatic Service saw postings in the Middle East and India. He held the position for four energetic years during which time he introduced several innovations to the Society's working structure. In particular he oversaw the computerisation of the office procedures. While in some ways this has eased, in others, because of broadening the Society's overall exposure through such as the Internet, it has increased the burden on its small and admirable administrative staff. In November 2001 Mr Norman Cameron, with a similar Diplomatic Service background in the Arab world, took his place. There were further changes also in the Honorary Treasurers, a post, as we have seen, not without considerable importance to the Society's very existence. In 1996 Mr Francis Witts briefly replaced Mr Wedge before Mr Neville Green took the post. An Arabist, with service in overseas banking, he holds the position in the centenary.

Three significant innovations in the Society's programme were made during the period. In 1971 a series of yearly tours to Asian countries was started, some of which have been both unusual and adventurous. In the early 1990s the Junior Membership was revived with expeditions to the north of the sub-continent and annual meetings held when Junior Members themselves gave talks about their own experiences. Both these subjects have been dealt with in separate chapters. In 1996 a programme of one-day visits to exhibitions of Asian interest, both in the United Kingdom and nearby Europe, was started, as recommended in the Black Report.

In 1997 and 1998 the Society, conscious of its historical roots in the sub-continent, hosted separate receptions to celebrate the fiftieth independence anniversaries of India, Pakistan and Sri Lanka. Each was followed by a talk by the respective High Commissioner.

In June 1999 HRH The Duke of York agreed to become the Society's Patron in succession to the Prince of Wales. The Society is indebted to His Royal Highness for the immediate interest he has shown.

The Society depends for its smooth running not only on its Honorary Officers but on other Members of Council – and indeed on voluntary ordinary members. At the start of the period under review Council was especially rich in those having Indian experience. Lord Birdwood, after service in the Indian army, espoused causes of the sub-continent, especially Tibet. Lord Gore-Booth, who had been High Commissioner in Delhi from 1960 to 1965, and later Head of the Diplomatic Service, joined the Council in 1970. Later, in 1995, Sir Nicholas Barrington, with service in Afghanistan, Japan, Vietnam, Iran and Egypt, before becoming High Commissioner in Pakistan, brought to the Council wide Asian experience and contacts. An unusual testimony to him stands at the British Mission in Islamabad in a fine marble statue of a young Queen Victoria which he rescued from a garden in Rawalpindi, although sadly she lost both hands during the Suez crisis. Air Chief Marshal Sir John Whitworth-Jones, who served on the Council from 1959 to 1972, was especially active. He organised the Society's first Annual Tour to Anatolia in 1971, established a working relationship with the Centre for International Briefing at Farnham Castle and actively encouraged a younger generation to join.

Dr Violet Conolly, who served the Council from 1963 to 1977, was a descendant of Captain Conolly, who was imprisoned and executed by the Emir of Bokhara in 1842. A Sovietologist of repute, she was a prolific lecturer and book reviewer, a member of the Editorial Board and a holder of the Percy Sykes Memorial Medal. Petite, frail-looking and of obvious intellect, her approach was invariably announced by the jingling of bracelets. An inveterate traveller, at the age of eighty-seven, she was preparing for yet another venture 'when a greater journey intervened'.

Nubar Gulbenkian, who served on the Council in the 1960s, was another valued committee man. A colourful character, changing his place of abode as often as his nationality (Persian, Turkish, British) and of his speech (Armenian, French, English) he will long be remembered for his burly figure, cigar, orchid and opulent dinner parties. His contacts in the oil industry were especially useful at that period of the Society's development.

Members of the Society are of long-lived stock. At the Annual Dinner in 1994 the Chairman, Sir Michael Wilford, reminded diners that it was the ninetieth birthday of Lady Alexandra Metcalfe, daughter of Lord Curzon, and the ninety-first of the Swiss traveller Mlle Ella Maillart. The following year Sir Michael mentioned that it was Dame Freya Stark's one hundredth. In 1997 Mrs Doreen Ingrams, joint Lawrence of Arabia Memorial Medal holder with her husband, Harold, in 1939, died aged ninety-one. Several members of the Society whom we met in Chapters I and II continued into this, the final part of our chronology. The Marquis of Zetland who, as Lord Ronaldshay, was a founding member in 1901 and Chairman from 1908 to 1913, continued as a Vice President until his death in 1961. Sir Edward Penton, the first substantive Honorary Secretary in 1902, likewise remained a Vice President until his death in 1967 aged ninety-two.

The Society has had many explorers and venturers throughout its history but it has never been in a position to finance or organise expeditions of its own, apart from the annual Asian Tours and the more recent Junior Member excursions. In 1922 the Royal Geographical Society suggested that the two Societies should finance a joint expedition 'through an unknown part of the Arabian desert'. There is no record of any such undertaking, though it may have led to the subsequent explorations of Mr H. St J. B. Philby and Mr Bertram Thomas. However, the Society has been asked continuously for help from individuals and young groups, but in each case it has had to limit its assistance to the use of the Society's Library for research, introductions to members with expertise on the areas concerned and written introductions to local Honorary Secretaries and those of influence en route. By 1972 the number of such submissions had increased to such an extent that the Society felt it necessary to clarify its policy by joining a working party of representatives from the Royal Geographical Society, the Foreign and Commonwealth Office, the Ministry of Defence and the British Council, set up to discuss the issue.

Yet, as the following examples show, individual members, singularly or in small groups, have continued to set off on their own ventures and projects, especially to those areas which the Society has loosely regarded as the essence of Central Asia. During the Civil War in the Yemen (1962–1968) some intrepid members travelled with the Royalist Forces across previously little explored Arabian territory; Lieut Colonel Gerald de Gaury, Colonel David Smiley, Mr Wilfred Thesiger, Lieut Colonel Neil McLean, Dr Philip Horniblow and Major Bernard Mills among them.<sup>5</sup> Dr André Singer has made journeys to Afghan border areas to study tribal anthropology.<sup>6</sup> Mr Hugh Leach visited a remote corner of Afghan Badakhshan in 1971 to explore how the waters of Lake Shiwa reach the Oxus, concluding work started by the Central Asian explorer Ney Elias in 1865, thus enacting Sir Olaf Caroe's edict that a purpose of the Society was to keep green his memory.<sup>7</sup> Mrs Isobel Shaw has crossed countless passes in Northern Pakistan with her son, researching for her guide books on that country.<sup>8</sup> Miss Susan Farrington has travelled widely throughout the sub-continent recording the cemeteries and remote graves of past British residents and soldiers.<sup>9</sup> Major E. R. L. Jones has made journeys into the Panjsher Valley in north-eastern Afghanistan to supervise, with the co-operation of the Swedish Committee for Afghanistan, the building of a local maternity clinic for the use of followers of the late Afghan leader Ahmed Shah Masoud. One such visit was made in October 2001 during the confrontation between the Northern Alliance and the Taliban. Mr John Hare has travelled to some of the most inhospitable areas of the Mongolian and Chinese Gobi in pursuit of his project to assist the Chinese authorities in establishing a reserve around Lop Nor for the remaining wild Bactrian camels of Tartary.<sup>10</sup> Professor John Carswell has explored archaeological sites as far afield as Inner Mongolia, returning to enthral the Society with his findings.<sup>11</sup> Those graduating through the rank of the Junior Membership have, similarly, been drawn by the lure of Central Asia. Captain Charles Timmis, a young

Gurkha officer, has, after tracing his footsteps, lectured the Society on the ill-fated explorer George Hayward,<sup>12</sup> while Mr Johnny Wyld has pursued the legend of Prester John in the area.<sup>13</sup>

With the collapse of communism, and the subsequent independence of the Central Asian Republics in 1991, several members have taken the opportunity to travel to these previously restricted regions. In 1998 Mr Hugh Leach, Mrs Isobel Shaw, Mr Adrian Steger and Miss Susan Farrington explored the sources of the Jaxartes (Syr Darya) river in Kyrgyzstan.<sup>14</sup> In 2000 Dr Philip Horniblow, Dr Raymond Bird and Mrs Philippa Treadwell rode through the northern Pamirs and the Trans-Alai in Tadjikistan and the following year across north-eastern Kyrgyzstan. Mrs Susan Belgrave has made two extensive rides through Kyrgyzstan, in 1999 with Miss Anna Cockburn and in 2000 with Kyrgyz companions only. In July 1999 Miss Claire Burges Watson set off from Ulan Bator to ride across Central Asia to Ashkabad in Turkmenistan. Travelling by both horse and camel, with necessary climatic halts in Bishkek and Samarkand, the 3,500-mile journey was completed in fourteen months.

Some of those members mentioned may be in the bloom of youth, but a great many who saddled their mounts were well on the wrong side of their allotted three score years and ten. And whilst some of these areas may not be so virgin as when first explored by Sven Hedin, Prejevalsky, George Hayward or Younghusband, they are still remote and still little travelled by Westerners. There is now fresh exploration to be done and these venturers will have helped to fill gaps in our knowledge.

Centennial Celebrations

The Centenary Dinner was held at the Savoy Hotel on 15 May 2001. The guest speakers were Lord Hurd of Westwell, an old friend of the Society, and Sir John Browne, Chief Executive of BP Amoco. Three hundred and fifteen members and their guests attended. Appropriately, fraternal greetings were received from Professor Tony Stockwell, President of the Royal Asiatic Society, under whose generous wings the Society was fledged.

Lord Hurd spoke of an 'arc of danger' in which Europeans live and around which periodically there is an explosion, or a danger of one. The British have historical connections within that arc and the Society in particular has informed opinion, born from the experience of its members, and personal contact with those making decisions. He spoke also of the continuing problems of Palestine, especially the issue of settlements.

Sir John Browne mentioned the coincidence, relative to the Society's centenary and the date of the Dinner, that in May 1901 William Knox D'Arcy, BP's founder, first obtained a concession from the Shah of Persia to explore and develop the resources of that country. Sir John then spoke of Asia as the continent of growth for business in the twenty-first century.

Other events were planned to commemorate the centenary. An essay competition with the title 'Central Asia in the Twentieth and Twenty-First Centuries: Prospect and Retrospect', sponsored financially by Shell International, was launched in October 2000 and circulated to one hundred and eleven British universities and colleges. The winner, Major Nicholas Kitson, an MA student at SOAS, won an award of £1,250. The runner up, Mr Kanat Issabekov, an MSc student at the Centre for Euro-Asian Studies at the University of Reading, was awarded £750.

A seminar entitled Central Asia: Past, Present and Future was held at the School of Oriental and African Studies from 1-2 November under the auspices of its Centre of Near and Middle Eastern Studies and in association with its Centre on Contemporary Central Asia and the Caucasus. It was generously sponsored by the Hong Kong and Shanghai Banking Corporation and the British Academy. Lord Howe of Aberavon gave the opening address and the panellists were drawn from universities and institutions in the Russian Federation, Uzbekistan, Kyrgyzstan, Kazakhstan, the United States, The Netherlands, France and Britain. A member, Mr Paul Bergne, previously Ambassador to Uzbekistan and Turkmenistan, was largely responsible for finding these speakers. Unfortunately, he was unable to attend himself having just been appointed the Prime Minister's personal envoy to the Northern Alliance of Afghanistan. The conference attracted an audience of some two hundred and fifty, many coming from countries in Europe, the United States and Asia itself.

The last two events of the centennial celebrations took place in early 2002. On 8 January Dr Frauke Heard gave the Centenary Lecture entitled 'The Gulf in the Twentieth Century' following just one hundred years on from the Society's inaugural lecture 'The Persian Gulf' by Mr H. F. B. Lynch. And on 23 January Sir Nicholas Fenn enthralled his audience, which included the Society's Patron, HRH the Duke of York, by describing the Centenary Tour to Tibet within its historical context.

In his Annual Dinner speech in 1962, Sir William Dickson remarked: 'The Royal Central Asian Society is not a gradually dwindling Society of charming middle-aged and elderly people bound together by nostalgic memories of summers in Kashmir, desert dawns and the history and romance of the East ... This is a Society which seeks to link the wisdom and accumulated knowledge of those who have served and studied those countries with the energy and enterprise of those who go out to help develop and trade with them today.' Those reflections remain true.

It would be rash to foretell where the Society will be in twenty-five years time, yet alone at its bi-centenary. Undoubtedly there will be problems ahead, not least those of finance, and many of the points raised in Sir Robert Black's memorandum of 1974 will continue to be relevant. But the Society will remain in a unique position to be the stimulus and focus for those interested in the affairs of Asia past and present and to continue that aim as set out by its Founding Fathers – 'To promote learning and advance education'. Let us hope that the Society's future fulfils Sir Edward Penton's toast at the Golden Jubilee Dinner – 'The Society, long life, success and tremendous usefulness'.

Part Two

THE MEMBERSHIP

VI

THE MEMBERSHIP

Practically anyone who has done anything of distinction in the East, in war, politics, travel or administration, finds it necessary, sooner or later, to join your Society.

Sir Edward Montague, Former President of the Royal Asiatic Society, 1935

A circular issued in the Society's Golden Jubilee year, 1951, stated that its membership included those from 'the Foreign Office of this and other countries; the Navy, Army and Air Force; oil companies, engineers, explorers, bankers, civil administrators, missionaries, students and authors'. There were other fields in addition; a glance through the members' address lists over the years shows not only the geographical spread but also the remarkable variety of professions and occupations. To mention but a few – the Indo-European Telegraph Department, Bombay; the Euphrates and Tigris Steamship Co; Government Quinine Factory, Naduvatom, India; Chemical Adviser to the Iraq Government, Baghdad; Electrical Engineer, Lhasa, Tibet; Chinese Government Salt Administration, Tzeliuching, Szechwan; Iodine Educational Bureau, London and Calciumstoffwechsellabor, Orthopedische, Universitaetsklinik, Zurich.

Among the earliest members were those who had been directly involved in the Indian Mutiny of 1857 or been members of Douglas Forsyth's Mission to Yakub Beg in Kashgar in 1874. Several served in the Afghan Wars of 1879 and 1919; six marched with Colonel Kelly to the relief of the besieged fort at Chitral in 1895; twenty-four were associated with the campaigns supporting the Arab Revolt in 1916–1918 and many were members of Dunsterville's and Malleson's Caspian missions at the close of the First World War. The Indian Civil Service, Political Service and the Army were from the outset the most prolific recruiting grounds, whilst a great many joined after the First World War from the Civil Administration set up in Mesopotamia in the wake of the British Expeditionary Forces' advance inland from Basra.

The majority became aware of the Society through word of mouth; it was not well known like the Royal Geographical Society. An example of this is the number who joined from the China Inland Mission, one of the most remote of all missionary endeavours. There was little opportunity for such people ever to attend lectures, furlough being only every ten years or so. But membership of the Society gave them a sense of common kinship with others who were absorbed by the continent of Asia. The Journal served to reinforce this bond and gave them an opportunity to learn about the exploits of their peers. Others became involved on reaching the end of their Asian careers, enabling them to recall past days and keep in touch with subsequent developments.

This diverse membership brought to the Society an immense and varied wealth of understanding of Asia. Sir Edward Penton, recalling how in the early days of the Society some fifty chairs might accommodate the average audience, added 'but measured by knowledge the Albert Hall would not have been sufficient'.

In this chapter brief pen-sketches are given of archetypes from a selection of those who made up the membership; not just the well known, but rather those whose achievements, often as great, have been hidden from public view. The dates given in parentheses indicate the year of their joining the Society. Some entries have been expanded upon, and yet others freshly included, in Chapter X.

Long-standing Members and Generation Links

At the start of the Society's centenary year the individual membership stood at 1,128, the longest serving of whom was Mr Paul Ensor, who joined in March 1934; a continuous membership of sixty-seven years. Sir Roderick Sarell joined in 1939, his father Mr Philip Sarell in 1929; both started their careers in the old Consular Service.<sup>1</sup> The longest serving overseas member was Dr Ercument Ataby (1943) from Istanbul. Of the lady members, Mrs Eileen Humphreys joined in 1944 (her father, Captain Harry Partridge, in 1933) and Mrs Jean Rasmussen in 1945. She had been married to the renowned explorer and plant collector, Captain Frank Kingdon Ward, whose links with the Society went back to 1924.

Mrs Eileen Humphreys

Similar to the Sarells, there has been a long tradition of links between generations. The publisher Mr (later Sir) John Murray was a Founding Member. His great nephew, the 'sixth John Murray' joined in 1939. Colonel John Tod, who had an adventurous career in the Indian Army, including serving in Malleson's Transcaspian Mission, joined in 1908; his son, Captain Norman Tod, RN, joined in 1950 three years after his father's death, narrowly impairing a ninety-three-year continuity. Both the sons, Hugh and William, of Colonel E. F. Norton (1929), leader of the 1924 Everest expedition, remain members. Captain Godfrey Meynell (1927) won a posthumous Victoria Cross campaigning in the Mohmand tribal area of the NWFP in September 1935; his son, Godfrey (1958) was also a Frontier Officer in the Aden Protectorate. The Revd H. W. Funnell (1938) was one of several members who served in the China Inland Mission where his son, Dr Victor Funnell (1956), who became Editor of the Journal in 1992, was born. A father and son team in the Diplomatic Service was Sir Christopher Summerhayes, a member of Dunsterforce in Baku in 1918 before joining the Levant Consular Service, and his son David, both of whom joined in 1946. A prominent Parsee, Mr K. A. Marker, author of A Petal from the Rose, joined in 1929 and his son, HE Mr Jamsheed Marker, Pakistan's ambassador to the United States, in 1964. These are to quote but a few examples.

Agents and Adventurers

The Society was famed in its early years for having among its members many who had been engaged in a variety of clandestine and adventurous activities. These have been chronicled in a number of works written either by themselves, their biographers or historians, not least the series of enthralling books by Mr Peter Hopkirk (1975), himself a holder of the Sir Percy Sykes Memorial Medal.<sup>2</sup> Best known of these adventurers is Lieut Colonel F. M. Bailey (1910) whom we met in Chapter II whilst escaping from Tashkent disguised as an Albanian army clerk and employed by a branch of the Russian General Staff to hunt for his own person. He has told the story of his adventurous life in a number of books, enlarged upon by his biographer. A member of the Indian Political Service, Bailey was a man of diverse parts, soldier, explorer, intelligence agent and naturalist – a Himalayan blue poppy is named after him. He was the Society's last remaining link with the 'Great Game' and thus, to some, embodied its quintessence. On retirement he served both on the Society's Council and as Librarian. He died in 1967 aged eighty-five. It was fitting that his nephew, Captain P. E. I. Bailey, RN was able to attend the Society's Centenary Dinner. He remembers especially his uncle's tremendous sense of fun. His security consciousness, however, meant that stories of his exploits had to be dragged out of him, but they were always accompanied by the assertion that nothing should ever be taken too seriously, particularly officialdom, which he described as 'The Mugwumps'. In the family he was called 'Hatter', a reference to the 'mad one'!

Bailey was accompanied on that historical mission to Tashkent by Major L. V. S. Blacker (1920) though he returned early because of sickness. Relations between them were strained and Blacker in his own Journal account of the mission,<sup>3</sup> and in his book On Secret Patrol in High Asia, failed altogether to mention Bailey even though he was the leader. Subsequently, Blacker joined Malleeson in Meshed. But Blacker was an adventurer. Despite suffering a broken neck from a flying accident during the First World War, in 1932 he made the first aerial photographic survey of Mt Everest, flying at 31,000 ft in temperatures of minus 45°C.

Another legendary member whose adventurous life paralleled that of Bailey was Major Reginald Teague-Jones (1919), whom we also met in Chapter II when he was General Malleeson's chief agent in Transcaspia at the close of the First World War. In the early 1920s he changed his name to Ronald Sinclair, remaining in the Society under that alias and giving an address care of his London Club. His professionalism ensured that his membership as Teague-Jones overlapped that of Sinclair, whose date of joining he placed back to 1921. In 1975 he changed his address to Marbella, Spain, presumably reckoning that by then the Soviets had lost interest in a punitive reprisal for his believed involvement in the murder of the twenty-six Baku Commissars in 1918. A book of his memoirs, Adventures in Persia, was published when he was aged ninety-nine, shortly before his death in 1988. A further book, The Spy who Disappeared, based on his diaries, was published posthumously.<sup>4</sup>

Major Reginald Teague-Jones

Several members from this period were involved with the agent Herr Wilhelm Wassmuss, the 'German Lawrence'. Having effected Wassmuss's capture when serving in Persia in the First World War, Lieut Colonel Edward Noel (1920) was himself captured in 1918 and held chained in a vermin-infested prison whilst on his way to join Dunsterforce, with which he subsequently served in Baku. A man of singular enterprise he twice cycled from London to India staying in tribal tents on the way. He died in 1974 aged eighty-eight.

Others involved with Wassmuss came from a more prosaic background. Major E. B. Soane's (1921) entry to the East was as an accountant with the Imperial Bank of Persia in Yezd. At the outbreak of the First World War he was representative of the Anglo-Persian oil company in Baghdad. Made prisoner by the Turks, he was marched across the Syrian desert to Mersin and imprisoned. On release he joined the Mesopotamian Political Department and was sent back to Iran. There, disguised as a Persian and guarded by six cut-throat Kurds, he travelled throughout the deserts of Arabistan and Bakhtiaristan living in a black tent and tracking down the seditionist agents of Wassmuss. Later he held administrative appointments in some of the wildest parts of Iran and Iraq, always guarded by his faithful Kurds. He died in 1923 on board a ship destined for North Africa, whence he was bound in order to restore his health, damaged by those adventures.

Herr Wilhelm Wassmuss

Colonel F. H. Bell's (1931) experiences began as a youth in China in 1891. He served in the Chinese Imperial Maritime Customs, spending his leave periods walking vast distances across the country. In 1905, whilst on leave from China, he joined the South African Police, fought in the Zulu insurrection and then walked across Madagascar. He was twice wounded during the War in Europe, after which he returned to China where he held posts in Macao, Chefoo, Kowloon and Canton, followed by Manchuria and Tientsin. Having to outwit the intrigues of the Chinese War Lords, he faced great personal danger. In 1936, as Defence Security Adviser in Singapore, he warned of the dangers to which the island was exposed if war came. No one listened and in 1939, labelled a scaremonger, he was sent home. He joined the RAF the following year when well into his sixties.

Roving agents apart, many members held overt appointments in Intelligence Bureaux throughout Asia and Sir Maurice Oldfield (1950), after war service in the Middle and Far East, rose to become Head of Britain's Secret Intelligence Service. Not only were such individuals great characters but their activities had a direct bearing on the way in which the British government formulated its policy. Their exploits still captivate, especially when seen from the perspective of a more technical age.

Explorers and Archaeologists

Many, if not most, of the great explorers and archaeologists of Asia were members of the Society, which thus enabled it to fulfil one of its early objects 'to catch the expert and the explorer when they are fresh from their most recent triumphs and to induce them to give at once to the world their experience and knowledge which otherwise might remain for years hidden away'. Amongst those who did so lecture the Society were such well-known names as Sir Aurel Stein (1909), Mr H. St J. B. Philby (1919) and Sir Wilfred Thesiger (1934). Others may be less familiar.

Sir Filippo de Filippi (1926), an Honorary KCIE, gave up the study of medicine for exploration and travelled in Russian Turkestan at the turn of the twentieth century. In 1909, accompanied by the Duke of Abruzzi, he explored the Baltoro glacier in the Eastern

Sir Aurel Stein's grave in Kabul, restored by British members of ISAF, March 2002

Karakorum, and in 1913 led an expedition to Baltistan, Ladakh and Chinese Turkestan under the patronage of the Italian and Indian governments. When news of the outbreak of war reached the party those members who were officers in the British and Italian armies made their way back to their respective regiments, whilst Filippi went on to Russian Turkestan. He subsequently became Secretary General of the Italian Geographical Society and was awarded the Mussolini Prize for Science.

Mr Douglas Carruthers (1935), a Sykes Medal winner, was an explorer and naturalist who, after joining a British Museum team in Central Africa in 1906, concentrated his exploration in Arabia, Central Asia and Mongolia bringing back fine head specimens of wild oryx and sheep. His knowledge of the Arabian deserts was exploited by the War Office during the First World War when he was engaged in preparing maps for the Arabian campaign. The Society inherited part of his valuable collection of books and charts.

Captain Frank Kingdon Ward was not only a great explorer but also a leading plant collector and author. We owe to him a number of rhododendrons now found in Britain. The son of a botanist, in 1904 he took up a teaching post in Shanghai but soon engaged in Himalayan expeditions and continued plant collecting and exploring for the next fifty years in China, Tibet, Burma and India. In the First World War he served in the Indian Army and in the Second with the Special Operations Executive in Burma. His most notable expedition was from 1924 to 1925 when, with Lord Cawdor (1925), he explored the world's deepest gorge along a tributary of the Brahmaputra river in south-east Tibet. On return he wrote The Riddle of the Tsangpo Gorges.<sup>5</sup> He was helped by Major F. M. Bailey, then Political Officer in Sikkim. In 1947 he married, as his second wife, Jean Macklin (1945), thirty-six years his junior, who accompanied him on most of his subsequent expeditions and who, as Mrs Jean Rasmussen, was mentioned at the start of this chapter. She retains vivid recollections of the period which appear in her own book of memoirs in the Society's Library.<sup>6</sup> In 1950 reports that both had been killed in an earthquake in Burma turned out to be untrue, and in 1954 he gave the Anniversary Lecture when he was described as 'without doubt the greatest living plant collector'. He died in 1958, aged seventy-two, planning his next visit to what is now Vietnam. He was one of the most prolific lecturers in the history of the Society, his first being in 1924. He was made an Honorary Member in 1947.

Lieut Colonel R. C. F. Schomberg first joined the Society in 1921, but subsequently resigned and rejoined at least three times, in keeping with his impulsive nature. He led a life of unusual variety as a soldier, explorer and finally Catholic priest. He is best known for his travels in the Karakorum mountains described, with his often acerbic pen, in four books. His papers and slides are in the Society's archives; a fuller description is given in that chapter.

Other European members included Captain Henning Haslund Christensen (1934), who led two of the Royal Danish Geographical Society's expeditions to Mongolia, one before, and the other just after, the Second World War. He died in Kabul of a heart attack part way through the second journey in 1948 aged fifty-two. The ambition of Dr Emil Trinkler (1929), from Germany, was to follow in the footsteps of those great explorerarchaeologists of the Chinese Central Asian deserts, Sven Hedin, Aurel Stein and von Le Coq. He fulfilled this in an expedition he led to the Taklamakan desert from 1927 to 1928 when, like those earlier explorers, he dug up buried treasures, now in the Bremen Museum. He was killed in a motor accident in 1931 at the young age of thirty-five.

Prince Peter of Greece and Denmark (1942) was an explorer and anthropologist who had gained first-hand knowledge by rides across Central Asia and Tibet in the 1930s. He was a regular lecturer to the Society on Tibet, Afghanistan, the Oxus, Sinkiang and the Danish expeditions to the sub-continent. His grandfather was King George I of the Hellenes, but the crown passed down through his uncle and cousin and for dynastic reasons he was obliged to live in exile in London, Paris and Copenhagen.

Members serving in remote parts of Asia were fortunate in those less hurried days in being able to combine their military and civilian functions with their passion for exploring. Many left their records behind in government reports; Sir Francis Younghusband himself is an example.

Frontier Officers

If the Society had a spiritual home in Central Asia it had another on the North West Frontier of pre-independence India. A glance through the early membership lists shows many addresses there: even the 'Office' of the Chief Commissioner of the Province joined in 1916. For those fortunate enough to serve on the Frontier it was a venturesome life. As Sir Olaf Caroe wrote: 'The Indian Political Service [which provided the Frontier's Political Officers] was probably the most colourful and adventurous service to be found anywhere in the world.' The obituary of one famous Frontier Officer, Major General Sir Arthur Parsons, which read 'He never married; the Frontier and his friends on the Frontier were wife, child and home to him' could have applied to many, married or not. Other obituaries frequently carried such depictions as 'They were the happiest years of his life, in contact with those fine rough men of the Frontier', or 'He could keep up with a Pathan youth on his own hills'.

Sir Olaf Caroe

Three great names stand out. Sir George Cunningham (1926) spent thirty of his thirty-five years of service in India on the Frontier or involved with its problems. He had the unparalleled distinction of being asked by Mohammed Ali Jinnah to return as Governor of the NWFP in independent Pakistan. Sir Olaf Caroe (1928) spent fourteen years there between 1923 and 1937 before returning in 1946 to see the region through the final stages of the transfer of power. But allegations by Congress of his partiality to the Muslim League caused him to step down before the crucial referendum on the future of the Province. In retirement he wrote copiously on the history of the area. But his interests ranged wider and included both Tibet and Soviet Central Asia. In 1951 he founded the Turcological Centre, which transformed into Lieut Colonel Geoffrey Wheeler's

Sir George Cunningham

Central Asian Research Centre. Caroe became one of the great pillars of the Society, serving as its senior Vice President for many years, and he was a prolific obituarist of his many departed friends.

Sir Evelyn Howell (1908) died in 1971 aged ninety-four after sixty-three years in the Society. He combined remarkably the role of scholar (he once returned the draft of a subordinate leaving only one word of the original) and man of action. In 1905 with firmness and courage he staved off a potential mutiny following the murder in his presence of a Militia Commandant by a rebellious sepoy. Again in 1930 his firm action quelled the Peshawar riots after a regiment mutinied. His monograph Mizh is a classic of the deep knowledge officers developed of the tribal peoples amongst whom they worked – as was Caroe's The Pathans. Long service on the Frontier seems to have gone hand-in-hand with long life and long service to the Society. Lieut Colonel W. Elliott-Lockhart (1931), who spent virtually his entire working life on the Frontier, was a member for sixty-two years, dying in 1993 aged eighty-seven.

Sir Robert Sandeman was perhaps the most revered of all Frontier officers. His administration of Baluchistan was a model for others to follow, eschewing the previously adopted 'Close Border Policy'. On 25 February 1935 a combined Society and East India Association luncheon was held at the Criterion Restaurant in honour of the centenary of his birth at which seven members who had had connections with him gave short speeches in his memory. They included Field Marshal Sir Claud Jacob, Sir Henry McMahon, Lieut Colonel C. E. Bruce, Sir Francis Younghusband and Sir Hugh Barnes. It is not surprising that both the current President of the Indian Army Association, Captain Sir Charles Frossard, and its Chairman, Major John S. Hewitt, are members of the Society.

Scholars

The Society's scholars were manifold; some were academics by profession, others became so as a by-product of their occupations. Several were holders of the Sir Percy Sykes Memorial Medal.

Sir Archibald Creswell (1930), a scholar on Muslim architecture, was without peer. Largely self-taught, his first experience of Egypt was service there with the Royal Flying Corps in 1916. He returned in 1920 and surviving the many rifts in Anglo-Egyptian relations, lived there henceforward, for many years as Professor of Islamic architecture at Cairo University. He described his large library, later bequeathed to the American University in Cairo, as 'my harem'. While he never married, as the Egyptian press stated in their fulsome tributes on his death in 1974, aged ninety-four, 'to the last he had an eye for a pretty girl'.

Foremost among the great professors of Arabic and Islam was Sir Thomas Arnold (1924). In 1888 he joined the Indian Muslim College at Aligarh when Sir Syed Ahmed Khan, its founder, was still preaching his liberal interpretation of Islam and his pro-Western views. Arnold adopted Muslim dress and was much revered by his Indian students. He later taught in London and Cairo. His gentle nature and obvious empathy for Islam made him as great an ambassador for Britain as anyone in Muslim countries.

Other Islamic scholars included Professor D. S. Margoliouth (1927); Sir Hamilton Gibb (1927); Professor Reynold Nicholson (1927); Professor A. S. Tritton (1938) and Professor Bernard Lewis (1939). The Society has lost in recent years two others; Professor R. B. (Bob) Serjeant (1942), who had an especial interest in South Arabia, and Charles Beckingham (1942), Professor Emeritus of Islamic Studies at London University and an active member of Council and Sykes Medallist.

The old Consular Services, invented by Britain for her extra-territorial role in those countries not part of her empire, offered adventurous and romantic-sounding careers with time to travel and absorb the local culture. As Sir Denis Greenhill said at the Seventieth Anniversary Dinner, 'One can only look back with nostalgia at the galaxy of distinguished scholars produced by the old specialised Consular Services in the various parts of Asia ... when our members could find time to produce dictionaries and monumental histories.'

Others became scholars as a consequence of the opportunities their careers furnished. For there is, seemingly, a difference between those who travel especially to obtain knowledge and those who acquire it through osmosis, a result of sustained residence. Lieut Colonel Gerald de Gaury (1923) learnt Arabic whilst recovering from wounds sustained at Gallipoli and this led to a remarkable career. He was the last of a band of Englishmen who played an active role in the creation of contemporary Arabia, knowing personally both Ibn Saud and the Hashemite Kings of Iraq. Later he became Political Agent in Kuwait. His last twenty years were spent in Brighton writing of his long experiences and passing them on to a younger generation. He died there in 1984 aged eighty-seven.

Gerald de Gaury

Persian scholars have included Dr L. Lockhart (1934) whose mentor was the great Edward G. Browne; Mr Peter Avery (1956); Professor Ann Lambton (1964), Emeritus

Professor of Persian, University of London and Sir Denis Wright (1945) who first joined the Foreign Office as a temporary war-time recruit with Consular posts in Romania and Turkey, finishing his diplomatic career as Ambassador to Iran. He has written books and articles on Anglo-Persian relations during the Qajar period and, uniquely, twice delivered the Society's Anniversary lecture, as well as being a Sykes Medallist.

Sir Clarmont Skrine (1922) is best known as an authority on Chinese Central Asia stemming from his time as Consul General in Kashgar. Less well known are his thirteen years of service in Iran. His command of Persian was such that when Consul General in Meshed during the war he and his wife put on a local production of Charley's Aunt in that language. He died in 1971 aged ninety-four having been a member for sixty-four years.

Professor Zekin Velidi Togan (1957) had a singular life. Born in 1881 in Bashqurdistan he studied classical Arabic and Persian at Kazan University. Determined that Russian Muslims should have a part in the administration he raised the Bashir insurrection against the Bolsheviks. After its failure he fled to Bukhara and joined Enver Pasha in his Basmachi revolt against the Soviets. After Enver's death in 1927 he settled in Turkey becoming Professor of Oriental Studies at Istanbul University. He died in 1971, aged ninety, ending one of the Society's remaining ethnic links with Central Asian history.

So many members served in Afghanistan that Lord Curzon remarked: 'If there is one Society that knows its Afghanistan it is the Central Asian.' But for actual scholarship few equalled the American, Dr Louis Dupree (1955), whose monumental work Afghanistan, published in 1971, remains a standard textbook.

Of the Society's many distinguished Japanologists, most started their career in the Japan Consular Service. But Professor Richard Storry (1968) started his in 1937 as a teacher of English at Otaru College in Japan's northernmost island of Hokkaido. After intelligence duties in the war he returned to Japan, later settling to a Fellowship at St Antony's Oxford where he wrote A History of Modern Japan. Likewise, the Burmese scholar Professor B. R. Pearn (1950) who, in the 1920s, became a lecturer at Rangoon University, remaining there until he was forced to escape from the Japanese by the long march into India. He returned to the university after the war before finishing his career in the Research Department of the Foreign Office when he contributed his knowledge of Burma to many publications, including the Society's Journal. Both were typical of other members who joined the Society whilst teaching at academic institutions in Asian countries.

Sinologists, Tibetologists and Mongolists

These disciplines often overlapped; one who embraced all three was Sir Eric Teichman (1919). Traveller, scholar and sportsman, he spoke Chinese as he spoke English. He entered the Chinese Consular Service at Peking in 1907 aged twenty-three when his duties took him frequently to Mongolia. In 1919 he was stationed in Tibet when he rendered a service to the Chinese by stopping an outbreak of fighting on the Sino-Tibetan border. He returned to the British Legation in Peking as Chinese Secretary before retiring eventually in 1936 after an epic journey from Peking to Delhi. Recalled in 1942 he acted as adviser to the British representative in Chunking, making another memorable cross-country excursion to get there. Despite battling with arthritis all his life Teichman was a great sportsman. During the civil war in Peking in 1922 Chinese troops occupied the racecourse. Under a white flag Teichman persuaded the General in charge to allow the October race meeting to occur, offering the Chinese officers places as enclosure guests. In 1944 he became an Honorary Vice President, dying later the same year.

Among the best known Tibetologists were Sir Charles Bell (1921), Sir Basil Gould (1937), and Dr Hugh Richardson (1937), who died in 2000 at the age of ninety-four. He was Britain's last envoy in Lhasa and was probably the greatest living authority on Tibet, his books becoming standard works for students.

The first recorded member sent on an individual mission to Tibet was Lieut Colonel R. L. Kennion (1928) in 1900. In 1912 Brigadier-General M. E. Willoughby (1921) led the commission repatriating through India the Chinese armed force that had been beleaguered in Lhasa by the Tibetans. Shortly before his death in 1939 he presented the Society's library with his well-illustrated report on this unusual mission. Mr F. Williamson (1925) was Trade Agent at Gyantse in 1924 and later Political Officer at Sikkim in 1935. He was to die at Lhasa at the young age of forty-four on the second of two long visits to Tibet.

Mission at Gnatong, 1912. Centre front:
Lieut Colonel M. E. Willoughby [RSAA Archives]

Other members were concerned with Tibet from positions in the India Office. In 1943 Sir Algernon Rumbold (1934) drafted the text of the British view on Tibet recognising that country as having enjoyed de facto independence since 1911, but stressing that Chinese suzerainty could be acknowledged only on the understanding that Tibet was regarded as autonomous.

One of the best-known Mongolists in the Society was Professor Owen Lattimore (1928). Also a Sinologist, on joining the Society he delivered a controversial lecture The Chinese as a Dominant Race.<sup>7</sup> During the war he became an adviser to Chiang Kai-Shek and later to the US government. However, his sympathies for the Chinese and Mongol people resulted in his becoming an unjustified target for the cold-war McCarthy witch-hunts. As a result he lost his academic post in the US and moved to Leeds where he founded the first centre for Mongolian studies in this country, remaining there until his retirement in 1970. Professor Charles Bawden (1965), who taught at SOAS, succeeded him as the Society's leading Mongolian specialist.

Although other societies may have made greater in-depth studies of these countries, the Society provided an active forum for presenting its members' research and harbours in its archives some of their results.

Missionaries and Medics

Members with these vocations served in some of the loneliest parts of Central Asia; several joined the China Inland Mission. The Reverend George Hunter (1930), who became known as 'The Apostle of Turkestan', joined it in 1889. He returned to England for furlough only once in the following fifty-seven years. Though essentially a missionary, he was also an explorer and knew Chinese Turkestan (Sinkiang) as well as anyone. But he was reticent about his findings, which made it especially ironic that in the end he was to suffer imprisonment and dreadful torture on suspicion of being a British spy. Exiled from the Turkestan he loved, he died as he lived a lonely man, nursed by Chinese Christians at Kanchow in the Province of Kansu. His personal triumph was the translation of the scriptures into the vernacular of the most remote tribes. We shall cover the activities of that remarkable trio, the Misses French and Miss Mildred Cable, who also worked in the China Mission, in a later chapter.

Revd George Hunter

The Reverend Oskar Hermansson (1947), a member of the Swedish Missionary Society, had, like Hunter, an eventful life at the hands of the local warlords. He reached Turkestan in 1920 after a six-week trek from Kashmir to Yarkand in the depths of winter. During the 1933 civil war in Chinese Turkestan, when local Christians were being executed for their faith, he, along with two other Swedish missionaries, found themselves tied to posts and facing a firing squad armed with muzzle loaders. An additional executioner, armed with a cudgel, stood by in case they missed. Hermansson 'found it difficult to fix his mind on higher things than a wish that the firing squad had Bofors equipment'. They were rescued at the last minute by local Indian Aqsaqals. He was interned again in 1938 when nearly every member of the Christian church was murdered. But he had managed to smuggle out to India his manuscript translation of the Bible into Eastern Turki, a work he completed in Bombay in 1946.

Among the medical missionaries the most singular was Sir Henry Holland, who ran his eye hospital in the North West Province of India. His career has been covered in the Lawrence Medal chapter. Another was Lieut Colonel G. Fox Holmes (1958), who worked for seven years in Central Asia before becoming, perhaps uniquely for a former missionary, Consul General in Urumchi where he was also interned by the Chinese. In retirement he became one of the Society's foremost experts on the area.

Several physicians in the Society served in prominent positions in Asia. Sir Harry Sinderson 'Pasha' (1923) arrived in Iraq in 1918. He was to remain there for twenty-eight years, mostly in Baghdad where he organised the Royal College of Physicians. Appointed Physician to the Royal Family, the Amir Abdullah of Jordan conferred upon him the title of 'Pasha'. He died in 1974, a day after the publication of his memoirs Ten Thousand and One Nights: Memories of Iraq's Sherifian Dynasty.

Colonel Sir William Willcox (1921) was Chief Consultant Physician in the Mesopotamian Expeditionary Force in the First World War. At its close he visited Northern Russia where he found 10,000 refugees from Baku, who had fled from the Turkish occupation of that city, huddled together, rampant with cholera, typhus and influenza. Recognising the last as an unusually virulent strain, he hastened back to Baghdad in time to initiate precautions before it ravaged Mesopotamia on its westward course.

Dr Oliver Garrod (1945) spent much of the Second World War engaged in medical work among the nomadic tribes of South West Persia, thus keeping them on the side of the Allies when German infiltration was at its height. Able to penetrate deep into Khuzistan, Luristan and the tribal districts of Fars, he collected seminal material on nomadism which he gave to the Society in a lecture on his return in 1946.<sup>8</sup> He accompanied the Society's tour to Iran in 1976 and became an active member of Council in 1980.

Although missionaries may be less in evidence today, there has been a recent emergence of Non-Governmental Organisations (NGOs), many operating in the aid, development and charitable sectors. Several members now belong to these, thus maintaining the tradition of personal involvement in Asian countries.

Journalists and Broadcasters

In 1953 there were thirty-three members actively engaged in journalistic work. Those working in London included correspondents for The Times, the Telegraph, News Chronicle, Daily Express, Daily Mail, Daily Graphic, the Jewish Chronicle and the Church of England Press, while others were based in the Middle East, Palestine, Turkey, India, Hong Kong and China. Among several from the BBC Overseas Services the most prominent were Mr Evelyn Paxton, of the BBC Arabic Service; Mr Nevill Barbour, a staunch supporter of the Palestinians, who also worked for the BBC Arabic Service, and Mr Eric Robertson who, after a broadcasting career in the Far East, returned home to the BBC Overseas Service. Significantly, Paxton, Barbour and Mrs Peggie Robertson were all involved in the Editorship of the Society's Journal as was, briefly, Mr Evan Charlton, once editor of the Statesman of Calcutta and Delhi.

The career of another member merits more detailed study. Mr Peter Hume went to Peking as assistant editor of the Peking Chronicle in 1937, aged twenty, before Japanese troops occupied the city. He joined the Society the following year. He travelled extensively in Mongolia and Manchuria and acted as Secretary to the Royal Danish Geographical Society's expedition there. During the war he worked with the Malay Broadcasting Corporation in Singapore when, due to the paucity of staff, he had to present the news, read it and then introduce a programme of music, all in different voices. Between the fall of Singapore and his return to restore a British Broadcasting Service there he was attached to the Chinese Ministry of Information in London. Subsequently he joined the BBC's Chinese Service. Most tragic was the manner of his death in 1954 aged thirty-six. He fell from the upper-story ledge of his flat in an attempt to effect an entry having mislaid his key. In the short span of his membership he had lectured the Society and served twice on its Council. His knowledge of the Far East was, at that period, of great value and he was exactly the type of young member the Society wished to, and still needs to, attract. Fortunately the tradition is being maintained. A young member, Mr Rupert Wingfield-Hayes is, at the time of writing, the BBC's correspondent in Peking, transferred temporarily to Afghanistan in October 2001.

Engineers

Outsiders may tend to think of the Society as being composed of soldiers, diplomats, scholars, administrators, explorers and travellers. On the contrary, its diverse membership has included those who have made an impression on Asia through feats of engineering not least in the field of communications. On retirement many served on the Society's Council, ensuring that the lecture programme covered this important aspect of Asia's development.

Among the great civil engineers, one of the earliest to join in 1920 was Sir Alexander Gibb, founder of the firm of consulting engineers that bears his name. His son Alistair, who followed him into the Society and under whose guidance the firm widened its activities in Asia, died in 1955 after a polo accident. Sir Alexander himself died in 1958 aged eighty-five.

Many were involved in Asian communication systems, especially railways. In 1920 the South Manchuria Railway Company joined as a corporate body. Colonel Sir John Ward (1921) was Director General of the Port of Basra when he joined. With a co-post as Director General of Navigation in Iraq, he maintained the Shatt-al-Arab waterway for a hundred miles. By re-building the airfield alongside the port, he helped improve the England to India air route. In 1936 he became Director General of the Iraqi State Railways. A man of many parts, he served also as the non-stipendiary priest for the Anglican community at Basra.

Mr Leonard Short (1954) was another who contributed to the development of Asian Railways through a career with the English Electric Company. In 1927, as Resident Engineer for the Company at Bombay, he was responsible for the part electrification of the Great Indian Peninsular Railway and later for sections of the network in Iran. During the war and after it he sought contracts for hydroelectric schemes in Asia, often through Portugal, realising the potential of her Asian colonies such as Macao. In a remarkably busy life his electrification schemes and thermal power stations involved many countries in the Far East.

Lieut Colonel Kenneth Cantlie (1959) joined the Jodhpur State Railways in India before going to China in 1929 where he became Technical Adviser to the Chinese State Railways in Nanking. He helped to rebuild the system which had fallen into neglect during the era of the War Lords, though his work was cut short by the outbreak of the Sino-Japanese war in 1937. Cantlie was the godson of the Chinese Dr Sun Yat Sen, mentioned in the previous chapter as having been kidnapped by the Chinese Legation in London in 1896.

Mr Norman Nairn (1923) and his brother Gerald were New Zealanders who had spent the First World War in the Middle East, after which they started the famous Nairn Transport Company whose articulated buses ran across the Syrian and Iraqi deserts from Damascus to Baghdad, running the gauntlet of Druse tribesmen.

In the public mind engineers may not be so romantic as explorers. But they left behind them a more tangible legacy, raising living standards and contributing to the economies of both Britain and the countries in which they worked.

We have quoted from the lives of a small, but representative, number of the membership. But there were, of course, members from many other professions, which do not fit neatly into the above categories. One of the most remarkable of these was the Scot, Sir Alexander MacRobert (1920). A self-made man, in 1884 he took up an appointment as Manager of the Cawnpore Woollen Mills in India. His business acumen was such he was soon President of the Upper India Chamber of Commerce, attending congresses world-wide, and the benefactor of many charitable projects, including Dr Graham's Homes at Kalimpong. Lieutenant Governors and even Viceroy's soon sought his counsel and in 1910 he was knighted. In 1918 he was the guest of the Afghan Amir Habibullah Khan in Kabul. In a lengthy stay the Amir sought his advice on the industrial development of the country and invested him with the Order of Honour. He was one of the last British visitors to have spent time with the ruler before he was assassinated.

After the death of his first wife Sir Alexander married, in 1911, an American, Rachel Workman. She was the daughter of the world-famous American mountaineers, Doctor Hunter and Fanny Bullock Workman. The Workmans, when in England, were frequent attendees at the Society's early meetings and in 1907 Fanny Workman lectured the Society on Exploration in the Himalayas. No doubt it was they who persuaded Sir Alexander to join the Society. He died in 1922 three months after being elevated to the Baronetcy of Cawnpore and Cromar, but his second wife, who had borne him three sons (the first union was without issue) survived him by thirty-two years. All three sons died while flying, two on operations in the Second World War. The combined wealth from Sir Alexander's business empire in India and his wife's inheritance enabled the creation in 1943 of the MacRobert Trusts, many dedicated to service causes. Prior to this in 1941 Lady MacRobert herself had donated a Stirling bomber, and later four Hurricane fighters, to the RAF in memory of their sons. An aircraft of the Service still carries the name 'MacRobert's Reply'.<sup>9</sup> Had the Society instigated its Corporate benefactor scheme in Sir Alexander's day, he might well have been in the vanguard, such was his philanthropic interest in Asia and the affairs of the Society.

Other members were businessmen in Bombay, Calcutta and Madras with Sir Thomas Ainscough (1916) as the Senior Trade Commissioner for India to support them. There were representatives also of the great British Trading Houses in Shanghai, Hong Kong and Basra and overseas bankers throughout Asia.

Lady Members

Ladies formed an important part of the Society from the outset, three being among the original members. Many were explorers and travellers of note. In 1913 Miss E. G. Kemp, on joining, lectured on An Artist's impressions of Western Tibet and the Turkestans.<sup>10</sup> The title was an understatement; she may have had pen and brush but she carried them on an adventurous journey from Kashmir across Chinese Turkestan and into Tibet. Sir Francis Younghusband, who introduced her talk, said it was a journey 'such as no lady before has ever undertaken'. In 1914 Miss Ella Sykes (1903) (sister of Sir Percy) spoke on 'Persian Family Life'; transcribed, it appeared as the second article in the newly inaugurated Journal that year. It was essentially a depiction of the oppressed condition of women in Iran but a reflection of the still prevailing male attitude of some at the time can be seen in the concluding remarks of the Chairman, Sir Mortimer Durand: 'Miss Sykes has got the idea that the position of women in Persia is not altogether desirable. I don't know; that is a woman's point of view. One thing is certain: ladies in England ought to be satisfied with their position.' A strange remark, perhaps, made at the height of the suffragette movement! In 1916 Miss Sykes became the first woman member of Council.

Many were well-known authors and travel writers, Dame Freya Stark (1934), Mlle Ella Maillart (1936), Rosita Forbes (Mrs McGrath) (1920), Mrs Steuart Erskine (1933), Lady 'Peter' Crowe (1947) and the still active Miss Dervla Murphy (1971) among them. Mrs Patrick Ness (1962) was a renowned geographer and author of Ten Thousand Miles in Two Continents. Dr Ethel Lindgren (1988), an anthropologist, spent many years in Mongolia and Manchuria studying reindeer nomadism. Others were reluctant to record their adventures. Miss Ada Christie (1918) roamed relentlessly over Asia Minor, the Middle East, Iran, the sub-continent, South East Asia, China and Japan. She had many a tale to tell but was too modest to do so.

Some lectures were directed specifically to Asian feminist issues. In 1931 Miss E. M. Aidin spoke on recent changes in the outlook of women in the Near and Middle East. In 1935 Mrs Guy Innes reported on the Women's International Conference at the Yildiz Palace in Istanbul, lamenting the fact that despite representatives from thirty countries, there was no one from Central Asia.

The Asian Membership

The Society has both valued, and been rich in, its Asian membership. The first to join in 1908 was Nawab Sahibzada Abdul Qaiyum Khan, when he was Assistant Political Officer of the Khaiber, Peshawar. A prominent figure on the Frontier, he became First Minister of the Province in 1932 and co-founder of the Islamia College in Peshawar. He was knighted in 1921. By 1951 there were 105 Asian members. Many who joined were from the sub-continent, some with, to British ears, exotic sounding princely titles: The Hon. Sir Bijay Chand Mahtab Maharajadhiraja Bahadur of Burdwan (1919); HH Maharaj Rana Sri Bhawani Sahib Bahadur of Jhalawar (1920); HH The Maharaja Manikya Bahadur of Tripura (1930) and HH The Maharaja Sir Tashi Namgyal, Gangtok, Sikkhim (1935). Two direct descendents of Shuja-ul-Mulk, the twelve-year-old proclaimed ruler of Chitral by the British in 1895, which resulted in the famous siege there, became members: Shahzada Nazir-ul-Mulk in 1932 and Colonel Khushwaqt-ul-Mulk in 1968. Major General Miangul Jahan Zeb (1963) was the last Wali of Swat and the last ruler in Pakistan exercising absolute power over his people.

There were 'princely' members from other parts of Asia also, including the Princes Chula and Bhidhyalab of Siam (1950). HH The Aga Khan, Sir Sultan Mohammad Shah, was elected an Honorary Member shortly before his death in 1957 and his grandson, Karim Aga, in July 2001. His Imperial Majesty the Shahanshah of Iran became an Honorary Member in 1965. HH Al Emir Haidar al Sherif Muhammad Emin (a son of Sherif Ali Haidar, whom the Turks appointed Grand Sherif in 1916) joined in 1946 from Baghdad. Other members from Iraq included Al Sayyid Murid Hussain Bukhari (1938) who joined from Kerbala, one of the most holy cities in Shia Islam; senior politicians such as Nuri Al Said (1945) and Baba Ali Al-Shaikh Mahmud (1950), a son of the Kurdish leader Mahmud Barzinji.

Other members closely connected with the Kurdish community were His Beatitude the Mar Shimun, Catholicos Patriarch of the Nestorian Assyrians (1933) and Major-General Ghazi Mohammed Daghistani (1944). He was a descendant of the great Sheikh Shamil, who raised the whole of the Caucasus against Imperial Russia. Ghazi was born in Iraq and schooled at the RMA Woolwich and the Staff College, Quetta. He rose to become Chief of Staff to the Allied Arab Command in the Palestine campaign of 1948, and in 1954 was Iraqi Military Attaché in London. He commanded the Iraqi 3rd Division at the time of the murder of King Feisal. Imprisoned and sentenced to death, he was released in 1960 and lived the rest of his life quietly in London.

Syed Waris Ameer Ali (1946) son of the Shia modernist thinker, Syed Ameer Ali, was one of the first Indians to join the Indian Civil Service. Retiring in 1929 he lived in London where, during the war, he was employed by the India Office. He married a daughter of the Earl of Dartrey, one of the Society's original members. Not surprisingly he became a pillar of it, rarely missing a meeting.

Members of interest who joined from Palestine, Jordan and the Levant included Ahmed Sameh Ibn Shaikh Raghib Al Khalidi (1924) who claimed descent from the early Muslim warrior Khalid Ibn Walid. He was a prominent educationalist during the period of the Palestine Mandate and established the only wholly Arabic-speaking school in the Middle East which possessed a sixth form in the style of English Public Schools. Several leading figures from Jerusalem joined during the period of the Palestine Mandate, most prominent of whom was Auni Abdul Hadi Bey (1936). He was an original member of the Young Arab Association, which later became the nucleus of the Arab Nationalist Secret Societies seeking independence from Ottoman rule and which gave rise to the Arab Revolt. He later became a respected Palestinian Arab elder statesman. Another distinguished member was the Christian Maronite Emile Bustani (1954). Arab nationalist, industrialist and philanthropist, had he not been killed in an air crash in 1963 he would probably have become President of Lebanon. The Arab Christian writer Professor Kamal Salibi, whose recent books on the origins of Christianity have caused some controversy, joined in 1950.

Some Asian members joined from their embassies in London. Sheikh Hafiz Wahba, a long-serving member, joined in 1931 when the Saudi Mission was styled the Royal Legation for Nejd and the Hedjaz. The Minister of the Persian Legation became an ex-officio Honorary Vice President shortly after the Persian Society was absorbed in 1929.

Pakistan has had an especially close relationship with the Society, many officers joining from their service on the North West Frontier, some after training at Sandhurst. Two became President of their country: Major General Iskander Ali Mirza, who joined as a Captain in 1938, was deposed by Field Marshal Ayub Khan (1951) in 1958. This must be the only occasion when the Society has had two Asian Presidents, one ousting the other, whilst both remaining staunch members. Mirza spent his last eleven years living quietly in London. General Mohammed Musa (1959) became Commander-in-Chief of the Pakistan Army at this time, and Sir Firoz Khan Noon (1940) Prime Minister in December 1957. Major General Hayaudin (1949) was a Frontier Force Officer who won a Military Cross in the war and rose to become Chief of Staff. He was killed in an air crash in 1965. Major General Shahid Hamid (1984) was a popular member. After Sandhurst he joined the 3rd Cavalry Division, seeing war service in Burma. At the time of partition he was Private Secretary to Field Marshal Sir Claude Auchinleck, the last British Commander-in-Chief in India and an Honorary Vice President of the Society. The two remained life-long friends. Shahid became Adjutant General and on retirement held ministerial posts. He lectured the Society on the Karakorum and Hunza and wrote five books, including the evocatively titled So They Rode and Fought. A Patron of the Adventure Foundation Pakistan, he gave support to the Society's Young Persons' tours in his country. He died in 1993.

Professor Akbar Ahmed (1979), after a career in tribal administration, settled to a university vocation of Oriental scholarship at Cambridge and was for a time Pakistani High Commissioner in London before moving to take the Ibn Khaldun Chair of Islamic Studies at the American University in Washington. He has been an established lecturer, article writer and book reviewer for the Society and was awarded the Sykes Medal in 1994 for his work in creating an understanding of Islam in the West.

The American Membership

The highest proportion of overseas members has come from the United States. The first recorded American member was the Library of the American Museum of Natural History, New York, in 1919, and the second Mr Heyward Cutting of New York (1925). By 1939 there were 39 members with addresses in the United States; in 1951, 45; and in 2000, 72 with 231 Journal subscribers.

Mr Paul Knabenshwe was an American diplomat with long service in the Arab world. He was Minister in Baghdad at the time of the Rashid Ali rebellion in March 1941 when he earned the thanks of the British by giving refuge to 150 desperate subjects there, throwing open to them his own house and those of his secretaries. He died shortly after in 1942. The Hon. Cornelius Van Engert (1959) entered the American Foreign Service in 1911, seeing Asian service in China, the Middle East and Afghanistan, where from 1942 to 1945 he was the first US Minister in that country. A regular visitor to the Society's summer activities, his overall contribution to Anglo-American relations was recognised by an Honorary CBE. He died in 1985 aged ninety-seven. Another senior American diplomat, Dr James W. Spain (1963), has published three substantial works on the North West Frontier of Pakistan.<sup>11</sup>

Mr Charles R. Crane (1923) was a generous benefactor to the Society and to educational institutions in Asia. As a young man he lived in Bukhara and Samarkand and later became US Minister in China where he spent much time locating the singers of Chinese songs that were in danger of being lost and making gramophone records of them. He later supported engineering works in Saudi Arabia and the Yemen. Dr George Rentz (1949) was another who spent much of his life in Saudi Arabia as a senior member of the Arabian American Oil Company ARAMCO. As Government Relations Officer he researched for the Saudis their claim to villages in the Buraimi oasis, counter-claimed by the Ruler of Abu Dhabi and the Sultan of Muscat and Oman and backed by the British. A friend of the explorer H. St J. B. Philby, he wrote widely on Arabia. In retirement he became Curator of the Middle East collection of the Hoover Institute at Stanford.

Dr George Rentz

Current American members include the Central Asian specialist Mr Paul Henze (1950) and Ambassador Hermann F. Eilts (1962). A distinguished diplomat with many years' service in the Middle East, he is renowned in the Society for his succinct and penetrating lectures.

Lack of space prevents the inclusion of any more specific biographies or of those from the several other nationalities represented in the Society. Suffice it to mention that glancing along a shelf of books on Asia one is impressed by how many of the authors, or the subject of the work, were members. Likewise many of the same family names continue to appear in current lists of those in the diplomatic, government or armed services. However, the Society is sustained by its ordinary membership. They provide the support and the attendance at its functions, some travelling long distances to do so. One elderly lady member, who never misses a talk or function, makes a round journey of 600 miles in order to attend.

Each member gives to, or takes from, the Society something different; for certain it has changed the direction of some lives. Listening to a lecture or reading an article in the Journal may awaken a latent spirit of adventure and change dreams into reality. At the close of the Society's centenary nothing exemplifies this more than the number of young, and indeed not so young, who have gone off to Central Asia to follow in the footsteps of its early members. They return, tell their tale, and so perpetuate the spirit and character of this small, but intimate, Society.

THE JUNIOR MEMBERSHIP

Some of us are getting middle-aged but I hope others are joining the ranks of the Society, who will continue the work and carry on the torch . . . and their places will be taken by active, enterprising explorers of the younger generation.
Lord Curzon, Annual Dinner, 1908

An important aspect is the encouragement of Junior Members, who are our future. . . I sincerely hope they will grow in strength and be able to promote knowledge of Asia and its importance to younger people in this country.
Sir Donald Hawley, Chairman, 1998

The Junior Membership is a short chapter in this Centennial History; but in a bicentenary version it would be enlarged considerably. From 1934 to the early 1970s what were termed 'Young People's' meetings had a regular place in the Society's calendar as the New Year lecture, when adult members brought their children and their young friends. The Chairman would often welcome those attending with 'Girls, Boys and Grown-ups' and the talks were sometimes referred to as 'The Children's Lectures'. At the time there was no separate Junior Membership, but a clear desire was shown by Council to inform, educate and entertain younger people about Asia.

The first of these Young People's talks was given in January 1934 by Major L. V. S. Blacker, whose career was chronicled briefly in Chapter VI. Entitling his lecture Flight Over Everest, he described his pioneering flight over that mountain in a bi-plane piloted by Lord Clydesdale. As the Chairman, Lord Lloyd, said at its conclusion: 'No better lecture for young or old people could have been given.' It must have set many a young heart racing; it certainly set a high standard for other Young People's lecturers to follow. Included among those who did come after were Sir Percy Sykes who, in 1937, spoke on The Heart of Asia and the Roof of the World<sup>1</sup> and Mr Eric Shipton in 1938 on Mountaineering in the Himalaya.<sup>2</sup>

There were no Young People's lectures during the Second World War. The series restarted in 1949 when Sir Henry Holland spoke of his experiences as an eye doctor on the North West Frontier of India. Another medical missionary, Lieut Colonel G. Fox Holmes, who had served some ten years in Chinese Central Asia, gave a captivating talk describing the lives of young people in that area.<sup>3</sup> In 1964 Lieut Colonel F. Spencer Chapman spoke on Tibet and Tibetan Children and Lieut Colonel E. H. Cobb gave several talks in this series. In Big Game Hunting on the Roof of the World he described how he obtained the pair of Ovis

Poli horns that now hang in the Society's Library.<sup>4</sup> At those on India and Jordan young people from both countries attended and distributed gifts to the audience.

One of the last lectures in the series also involved audience participation when three members of the Society, who had served in parts of Arabia as Political and Desert Intelligence Officers, gave a presentation of life among the Bedouin. Two were dressed as tribesmen, one as an Omani and another, clad in only a loincloth and blue indigo, as a Mahri from the Hadhramaut. Offering dates and coffee, with full Arabian ritual and conversing in Arabic, the young audience were fooled, though, like the furniture at the Royal Overseas League, many became well covered in indigo!<sup>5</sup> Such talks gave an understanding to the audience of the lives lived by others.

Younger speakers themselves started to appear in the Society's calendar in the late 1960s and early 1970s. Members of a Cambridge University expedition to West Pakistan spoke on opportunities for young people to work voluntarily in the area and members of Voluntary Service Overseas encouraged others to follow in their footsteps. The first report on schools' expeditions, entitled Practical Problems of Asian Exploration for Younger Members, was given in 1972 by Major Peter Willey, who had led several expeditions of boys from Wellington College to the Alamut valley in Iran. The pattern of the Society's approach to young people was clearly evolving: adventure, education and involvement with encouragement to do the same, rather than mere didactic teaching. However, by the mid-1970s, the first meeting on the lecture calendar in January, that had traditionally been described as the 'Young People's Meeting', became the Christmas Lecture. While usually of an entertaining nature, it was no longer specifically aimed at the younger generation.

In 1962 Council felt there was now sufficient interest to introduce a separate Junior Membership for those under twenty-five at a nominal annual subscription of 10/-. Initially, only eight joined. To encourage recruitment, letters from the Chairman were sent to Parliamentary Parties, University Appointments Boards, the School of Oriental and African Studies, firms interested in Asia and careers masters at schools. By 1972 numbers had grown to twenty-four. As the Society was making a loss on such a small subscription the age limit was later dropped to twenty-one but raised to twenty-five again in 1998, with a further reduced step-membership fee for those graduating from the ages of twenty-five to thirty.

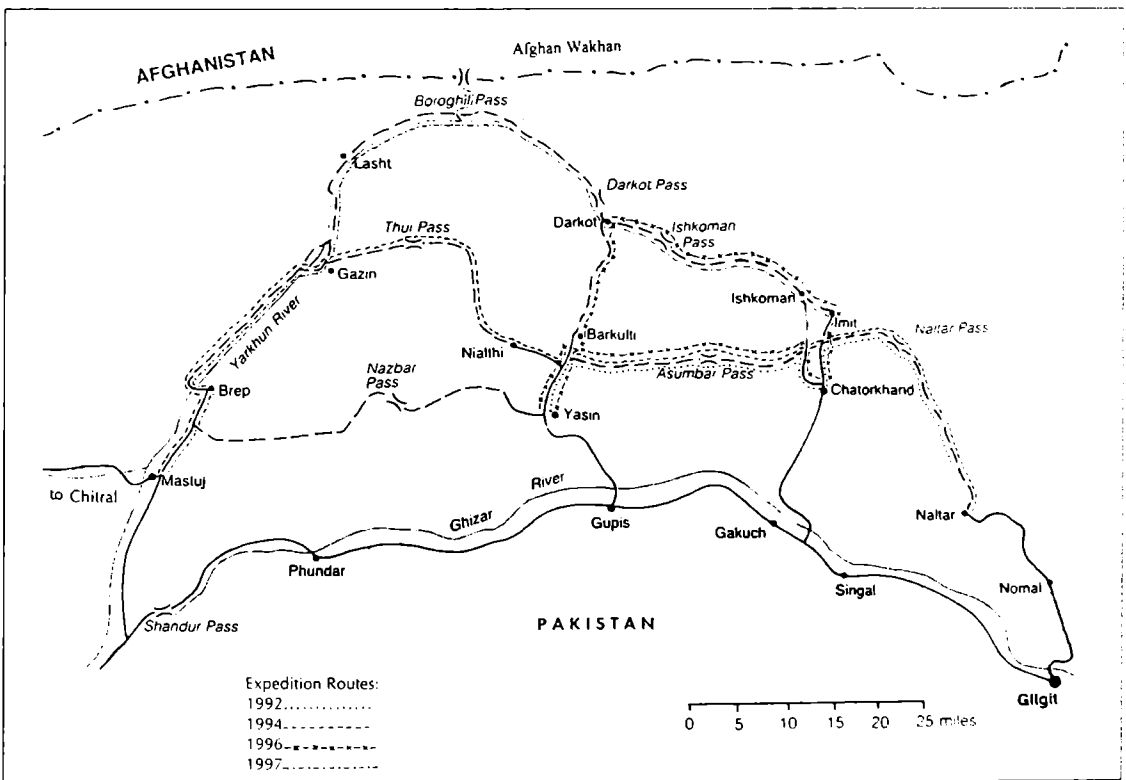

In 1991 an incident took place which changed the whole direction of Young People's activities. That year the Society's Annual Tour was to Siberia. From Gorno Altajsk the party visited the edge of the Balukha range in the Altai mountains. One of its members, Mrs Anne O'Regan, looked longingly at the distant peaks and felt disappointed she was not able to join some others in an extensive walking tour there. On return she raised the matter at Council proposing there should be a tour 'specifically for younger members' – in mind were those under fifty – who felt themselves fit enough to engage in more strenuous activity. She suggested that a member, Mr Hugh Leach, might lead them. Mr Leach responded that it would be more appropriate to organise Society-led tours for those under twenty-five. Council firmly backed the idea. He approached his friend Mr Adrian Steger who agreed to co-lead any such expeditions: a surgeon, there was the advantage he could act also as doctor.

The result was a series of expeditions to Northern Pakistan and North West India, comprising either the Junior Members themselves, schools affiliated to the Society or conducted under its aegis or association. To allow a greater understanding of the peoples to be experienced, those taking part were briefed beforehand on the histories and cultures of the areas concerned. The terrain covered often involved tough walking, so there was the physical challenge as well. Dialogue with the locals was encouraged so that the young participants could investigate and appreciate the differing cultures, religions and value systems themselves. The routes were tailor-made so as to form a link with the early history of the Society and to give a sense of wilderness adventure, yet, where at all possible, to be within a three-day march of a road-head. A further safety feature was to have a doctor with the party who could also treat the local people. This allowed even greater contact between the travellers and the people among whom they were travelling.

The first expedition of six junior members (four boys and two girls) was in 1992 through the remote Ismaili-populated valleys between Naltar and Yasin in North Western Pakistan.<sup>6</sup> The timing was apt since it was HH the Aga Khan who had been guest speaker at the Annual Dinner the previous year and his encouragement and introductions in the area were of great value. On this expedition two 15,000 ft passes, the Naltar and the Asambar, were crossed. This general area, though not those passes, had been explored by Sir Francis Younghusband at the end of the nineteenth century.

For this and subsequent expeditions to Pakistan invaluable help was given by the Adventure Foundation Pakistan (AFP). A charitable organisation, the AFP was founded in the early 1980s by Brigadier Jan Nadir Khan to develop leadership among young Pakistanis, and others from neighbouring Asian countries, through the medium of outdoor education and adventure training. The Foundation has also provided invaluable support to such British-based projects as Operation Raleigh. The AFP provided their own young leaders, principal among whom was Rana Naveed Anjum, who accompanied all the Society-sponsored tours in Northern Pakistan. These young Pakistanis acted as the interface between the expedition members and the locals, few of whom spoke English.

The AFP itself, without whose help these ventures would not have been such a success, became an Affiliate Member of the Society. The use of host country organisations for in-country administration, such as travel, tentage, rations and portorage, allowed greater local contact than would have been possible making such arrangements through commercial companies.

In 1994 a party of twelve boys from Abingdon School made a strenuous expedition crossing three high passes and some 160 miles between Naltar and Mastuj. Though taking a more difficult route, it emulated the first leg of the march made by Colonel Kelly in 1895 to relieve the besieged fort at Chitral. This traverse, one hundred years after Kelly's historic epic, was singularly tough, but his timing was equalled.<sup>7</sup> In recognition of this achievement the expedition was asked to provide a school flag to hang at the AFP Centre in time for a visit by the Foundation's Patron-in-Chief, the President of Pakistan.

In 1995 four Junior Members trekked through Kinnaur, Spiti and Lahoul, an area south-west of Tibet on the Trans-Himalayan plane, only recently opened to non-residents. Starting from Sarahan, they crossed the 15,300 ft Tarikanga Pass into Spiti and the Pin valley. This valley was first visited by Mr Louis Dane, Assistant Commissioner in Kulu, in 1884. He was one of those shot and wounded at the Society's meeting in Caxton Hall in 1940. Spiti, 'where Kim and his Lama walked', was bleak but endowed with unique Buddhist monasteries at Tabo, Ki and Kibar. The onward march entailed crossing the 15,000 ft Kunzum La into Lahoul, two thigh-deep river crossings and the 16,500 ft Baralacha Pass.<sup>8</sup>

There were two further expeditions to Northern Pakistan. In 1996, a large mixed party from Culford School crossed the Asambar Pass from Yasin to Chatorkhand, and then over the spur of the Hindu Kush traversing the Ishkoman Pass into Darkot. That pass has been described by Colonel R. C. F. Schomberg in his Between Oxus and Indus. An achievement of this expedition was to locate the exact location of the 'Farang Bar', where the explorer George Hayward, on his way to investigate the source of the Oxus, was murdered on the orders of the Mir of Yasin in 1870. At that spot two of the pupils read Sir Henry Newbolt's poem He Fell Among Thieves describing, somewhat fancifully, that dramatic event.<sup>9</sup> On reaching Yasin the party visited the rock on which Hayward had carved his initials and an arrow, supposedly indicating his onward route west along the Naz Bar. This has been a point of pilgrimage for those interested in Hayward. The party was disturbed to find that the rock had been drilled for dynamite to clear the land for building. (Four years later two members<sup>10</sup> visiting the site found that the rock had been demolished along with this small piece of British history.) The President of the Royal Geographical Society was informed of these events as they concerned one of its Gold Medallists. This drew an appreciative response.

In 1997 a party of army cadets from the Royal Russell School, Croydon, made a disciplined march from Mastuj to the foot of the Boroghil Pass on the border with the Wakhan corridor of Afghanistan. Tempting as a foray into that remote part of Afghanistan was, the expedition turned back south to cross the 15,000 ft Darkot and Ishkoman passes.<sup>11</sup> Curzon had crossed the Boroghil in 1894 on his way to meet Younghusband, then Political Officer at Mastuj. This was the start of a relationship on which the Society was formed. And it was Colonel Thomas Gordon, the Society's first Chairman, who first learnt of the existence of those two passes while crossing the Wakhan in 1874. Though he never attempted to cross them, he pointed to their possible use by an invading Russian force from the north.

In 1997 a new series of Annual Junior Members' meetings was started. These were organised by Mr Adrian Steger and held at the East India, Sports and Public Schools Club. The format differed substantially from those pre-1970 meetings in that the four to six short talks were delivered by young persons themselves, followed by discussions. They attracted a mixed audience of both young and old, society members and those outside it. After the addresses, the meetings moved on to a dinner, or drinks, allowing experiences to be exchanged, plans for future expeditions made and friendships forged. The talks have been a mixture of the theoretical, the academic and the adventurous. They have included such diverse subjects as trekking expeditions in Tibet and the sub-continent; studies of Delhi's slum conditions; research into the Islamic legal basics in Pakistan; working with UNICEF in Afghanistan; the survival of the Asian tiger and life under the China Seas.<sup>12</sup> Some of the talks have been expanded and included as a lecture in the Society's main calendar programme.<sup>13</sup> The ages of the speakers has ranged from thirteen to thirty. Alexander Steger, who spoke on Trekking with my Family and Other Animals, a family trek around the Spiti valley, was possibly the youngest to have addressed the Society.

The meetings have been good recruiting grounds; the cry has been 'Bring a friend'. By the end of 1999, there were 29 Junior Members under twenty-five, and 25 who had graduated to the twenty-five–thirty bracket. The majority have continued their membership into the senior category.

These Junior Members' activities, with their broad exchange of ideas and contact, have had an influence on those participating, some even changing their university courses as a result. Others have gone on to organise their own expeditions in Asia, work as trekking guides and even to form a company running both educational trips for schools to India and advising multi-national companies on cultural sensitivities.

General Sir Richard Gale, who chaired Lieut Colonel Fox Holmes's talk on Youth in Central Asia, concluded by saying: 'I hope that a sense of adventure will make you want to visit this part of the world. I can assure you that it is only when you have travelled in these wonderful countries and met these astonishing people, that you really taste a breath of life.'

THE JOURNAL

It is a Journal of really very great importance and is read all over the world.
Rt Hon. Patrick Gordon Walker MP, Annual Dinner, 1968

The birth of the Society's Journal was a by-product of a recruiting drive. In July 1913 Council asked overseas members to write in with news of current events of the countries in which they were living. These items, together with a list of new publications on Asia and lists of relevant articles appearing in sundry periodicals, would be carried in the Society's intermittent printed papers.<sup>1</sup> This, it was hoped, would foster an increasing interest in the Society and thus of its membership. Prior to this the Society published only occasional papers carrying the texts of those lectures deemed by a special sub-committee to be worthy of such treatment. Although the first lecture was delivered on 15 January 1902, the first evidence of one being printed was that by General E. F. Chapman, Our Commercial Policy in the East, published in 1904. The publication was headed Central Asian Proceedings, amended in the second such paper to read Proceedings of the Central Asian Society. It appeared between crimson covers, a colour, with tone variation, held to the present.

These occasional papers numbered between three and seven a year and were combined with periodic membership lists and, from 1908, an account of the Annual Anniversary Meetings and Dinners. They were distributed free to members. Extra copies were available at 1/-. For non-members they cost 2/6d. This arrangement, which continued until the end of 1913, did not constitute a journal. The response from the overseas membership to Council's request, however, was such that it was obvious that their contributions would expand considerably the current printed papers. The Secretary, Miss Hughes, was asked whether she would undertake the editing of such a journal, the first time that term was used. This agreed upon, the first issue was launched in early 1914 under the title Journal of the Central Asian Society. Its opening article was A Visit to Mongolia by E. Manico Gull. This was followed by several pages headed 'Notes and News'. Items carried varied from 'Captain F. M. Bailey's Latest Exploration', to 'China's Coal Supply' to 'Turkish Boy Scouts'. Also included were lists of 'Recent Books on the East' and 'Publications of the Central Asian Society'.

In March 1915 booksellers were asked to take the Journal and display it in their windows. In 1917 Sir Francis Younghusband, then back on the Council, wrote to the Viceroy in India asking that the Journal be taken by different departments of the Indian government. In 1918 the first photographs appeared. In 1920 a proposal was put to the Persia Society that both societies combine their magazines, but the idea was rejected. By 1921 500 copies of the Journal were being printed at a cost of £200; that number increased to 620 the following year. During the war it had not always been possible to keep to the number of proposed publications, but the quarterly editions were achieved from 1921 for the next twenty years.

As the number of transcribed lectures increased, the volume of 'Notes and News' decreased until these were occasional items only. In 1921 the lists of books gave way to actual book reviews (despite a decision the previous years not to include any) when Sir Percy Sykes's A History of Persia was reviewed by Sir Mortimer Durand, reprinted from the Journal of the Royal Asiatic Society. In 1922 there were three reviews. By 1925 they included several on works in foreign languages. By 1929 the book review section had become a major feature of the Journal occupying 54 out of 160 pages in Part I of that year. But the reviews were long, four and a half pages being common. In 1935 a review of The Transformation of Nature in Art by Ananda K. Coomaraswamy occupied ten pages and The Spirit of Zen by A. W. Watts, reviewed by Bishop A. Lea, eleven and a half: a record.

Reviewers pulled no punches. One 'H.W.', reviewing in 1931 A Tour in the Himalayas and Beyond by Lieut Colonel Sir Reginald Rankin, Bt wrote: 'The author set out with practically no knowledge of any Indian language, with an indifferent camp outfit and a bad lot of servants and blames everyone but himself for the troubles and difficulties that arose and which fell heavier on his unfortunate wife, whose pluck is the only bright feature of this book ... It would have been much better if it had not been written at all.'

Especially vicious were those experts on Arabia who were critical of any daring to trespass upon their territory. In 1925 the Arabian explorer Mr H. St J. B. Philby reviewed a somewhat lightweight work, Through the Inner Deserts to Medina by the Countess Donshka Malmignati, suggesting it was largely a work of fiction: 'A careful reading of the book forces one instinctively to echo a question asked of herself in the closing paragraph "those last three months were they but a dream?" One is tempted to answer in the affirmative.' The Countess, in a spirited reply, retorted: 'I am not the De Rougemont Mr Philby makes me out to be ... my book is true ... But as such known Arab travellers as Palgrave and Mr D. Hogarth had also to undergo the critical doubt of Mr Philby, I should not mind being added to victims so highly esteemed and distinguished.' The correspondence continued in this vein over two years.

In 1933 there was another prolonged correspondence battle between those two Arabian Titans, Mr Philby and Mr Bertram Thomas, who had reviewed each other's books and were especially critical over the respective locations and spelling of the 'lost city' of Wabar/Ubar. Philby had the advantage of being able to head his letters as written from 'Mecca, Arabia', whereas Thomas had to be content with Trinity College, Cambridge. Arabia seems to attract a peculiar possessiveness. In 1993–1994 a not dissimilar correspondence ensued between Mr H. St J. B. Armitage, an acknowledged authority on Arabia, who had known the great Philby himself, and Mr Leslie McCloughlin, an accomplished Arabist, over their respective articles, books and reviews relating to Saudi Arabian history. Invariably, this type of correspondence had to be closed by the well-tried Editor's formula.

Criticism by reviewers of the English spelling of vernacular names was another repeated source of irritation to authors, who regarded this as unnecessary pedantry. Such a view was aired in 1935 by Mr H. C. Armstrong in defiance of remarks made by a reviewer over the spelling of place names in his book, Unending Battle, about the Georgian struggle for independence. 'Mr Allen criticises my spelling of Akalzika for Akhaltzikhe. This is the old quarrel between the pedants and those who, like myself, believe that a name should show easily to the eye and sound easily to the ear and not be spelt in accordance with some rigid rules of transcription laid down by Professors . . . No Georgian, however full of drink, ever made a noise like Akhaltzikhe. He would have to gargle himself into apoplexy before he got anywhere near it.' Others took the reverse view. In 1932 Philby wrote: 'I will content myself with deprecating the deplorable fact that a Society like this should tamely follow the fashion set some years ago by Colonel Lawrence of spelling Arabic words just anyhow.'

The Journal frequently advertised books written by members which had been reviewed in that same issue. A delightful illustration of this in 1935 was a book The Peshawar Vale Hunt by Captain and Brevet Major G. S. Hurst, MFH, Royal Signals – illustrated by Snaffles and Major H. M. Tullock of the Poona Horse. 'A book that almost makes you hear the cry of hounds in full chase across the green fields of Peshawar.' The reviewer, Sir Evelyn Howell, 'Whipper-in 1904–1908', who had served many years on the North West Frontier, and who became one of the great names of the Society, enlarged upon this notice by making the reader feel he was riding to hounds himself.

Apart from acrimonious conflict between author and reviewer, the letters section of the Journal also carried practical advice. In 1928 a correspondent wrote: 'Members who are returning to Iraq and Persia in their own cars may be interested in the following account of a 12 H.P. touring car crossing the Syrian desert to Baghdad . . . over soft sand and camel thorn.' And subsequent advice on continuing to Persia: 'For the remainder of the journey from Khanikin to Duzdab a big 29 horse power car is advisable, enough to carry 700 lbs of luggage and 56 gallons of petrol.' For the final leg from Duzdab to Meshed, a further 553 miles, the advice was to take a tennis racquet: 'The European communities in the towns passed through are most hospitable and will swallow with relish anything new in the tennis line.'

Three pages of notes by Mr Edward A. Waters on equipment and supplies taken by him and his wife on a journey from Bandipur to Kashgar and back in 1932 show how lightweight travel was not yet in vogue. 'We took with us a Shikari, cook and bearer, tiffin coolie, an assistant cook, a coolie who was a good pony man. A sweeper is a great convenience. Heavy Gilgit boots and fur coats make the evenings bearable on the Pamirs and several times we slept in them. Take folding camp cots and folding canvas wash basins and a bath tub ... a rifle, gun and pistol, the latter useful for the feeling of assurance it might give one.'

' . . . over soft sand and camel thorn.'

This wide spread of articles, book reviews and letters enabled Sir Arnold Wilson to say of the Journal at the Annual Dinner in 1931: 'The articles are of quite exceptional interest and value. Indeed we have received special praise at the hands of The Times Literary Supplement, than which there is no higher authority or praise.'

It was not long before there were subscribers to the Journal outside the individual membership. By 1922 there were 12, their numbers shortly to include the Russian Consul in Tabriz. By 1948 this had reached 89, including the U.S. Central Intelligence Group, Washington. Ten years later the figure had reached 336; there were 120 in the United States (the Georgetown University handbook mentioned the RCAS Journal as 'one with which each student is advised to make himself or herself very familiar'), 31 in China, 17 in the USSR and 7 in Japan. An indication of the regard in which the Journal was held is shown by the fact that even when the individual membership of the Society decreased the number of Journal subscribers actually increased. By 1964 there were 454 subscribers in fifty different countries, including 135 in the USA, 35 in Iran (24 of which were subscribed by CENTO), 23 in India, 25 in Pakistan and 14 in China. In 1975 the number had reached 577, requiring 2,500 copies of the Journal to be printed. In 2000 there were 431 such subscribers in some thirty countries when a total of 1,600 copies of the Journal were required for each issue. The cost per annum for subscribers (it was always free to members) rose gradually from 25/- in 1961 to £9 in 1977, £30 in 1991 and £40 in 2000.

In 1939, prior to the outbreak of war, free copies of the Journal were sent to the RAF Cadet College at Cranwell, the Royal Naval College, Greenwich and the Imperial Defence College. In the early years of the conflict extra copies were required for circulation to army messes and hospitals both to make the Society better known and for their educational value. A problem arose in 1941 when, as part of war-time economy measures, the Society's paper allowance was cut by 50 per cent, making its consequent quota of 5 cwt of paper, and that of poor quality, sufficient only for 1,750 copies at three issues a year, each of 120 pages. As about half the Society's membership was then abroad, there was concern lest the reduction of this, their only link, should result in resignations. A petition was made to the Government Paper Controller asking for the cut to be reduced to 25 per cent. The submission pointed out that the Journal helped the war effort in respect of both the morale of troops and of the propaganda resulting from the prestige it portrayed of the British Empire. 'If copies were sent to Air Force and Army messes in the Middle East and the Burma Front, it would be good for the morale of young officers in those places, both as relieving boredom and in helping them to find an interest in the part of the world in which they were serving.'

Meanwhile, to abide by those economy measures, the number of issues per year was cut from four to three, combining parts III and IV. This was, perhaps, not such an inconvenience, as during the war it proved difficult to sustain high-quality articles. In fact the Journal never returned to four separate issues. This practice was kept until 1965 when it settled to three straight issues with no pretence at a combination.

APOLOGY

It is very much regretted that, owing to printing difficulties resulting from the serious flooding experienced in southern England this autumn publication of the Journal has been delayed, for the first time in office memory.

September 1968 at our printers, Billing & Sons Limited of Guildford.

As we have seen, when the Journal was instituted as such in 1914 the Secretary, Miss Hughes, as other secretaries after her, became effectively its editor. Miss Hughes was helped by Lieut Colonel A. C. Yate, then a member of Council prior to his becoming Honorary Secretary in 1919, and successive secretaries by Mr Edmonds from the Society's printers, Billing and Sons. In 1924 a separate sub-committee was formed under the title 'Journal and Details and General Purposes Committee'. Its records are scant but it seems it was concerned mostly in choosing lecturers and selecting articles for the Journal rather than having any editorial role. It was disbanded in 1934 and its duties reverted to the main Council.

It was not until July 1961 that an Editorial Board was established, consisting of at least two members of Council, the remainder from the Society at large. Its first members were Lieut Colonel Geoffrey Wheeler, who became the Board's Chairman, Sir Gilbert Laithwaite (later to become the Society's Chairman), the journalist and broadcaster Mr Neville Barbour, Miss Violet Conolly, Colonel C. H. Ellis and Mr E. H. Paxton. The original concept was that individual members of the Board should retire after three years to give way to others with similar area expertise. This held under Wheeler's chairmanship but subsequently lapsed.

An editor was appointed in October. Amongst those considered were Mr Stewart Perowne (husband of Freya Stark) and Colonel C. H. Ellis. In the event Mrs K. E. West, who had worked for Wheeler at his Central Asian Research Centre, took the position.

The choice was ideal: she had wide literary experience, having served on the editorial staff of the Encyclopaedia Britannica's Research Bureau, as sub-editor of International Affairs, and during the war in the Press Department of the British Embassy in Moscow.

Prior to Mrs West's appointment, the Journal was something of a house periodical; Colonel Wheeler, not a man to mince his words, described it as 'rather parochial'. However, as it was essentially the only British periodical concerned with current Asian affairs, it did now require development on more comprehensive lines, not least the section dealing with book reviews. A growing number of books on Asia were being offered and discipline was required for limiting their treatment; there was no longer space for eleven-page reviews. Also, whereas previously most articles in the Journal were transcripts of lectures delivered at the Society's meetings, not all such lectures, especially those illustrated, were now of sufficient substance to be included. The new format was to include articles submitted by individuals, many of them well-known scholars. A few received a small honorarium, though most were content with the prestige it bestowed. As a result the Journal soon reached an even greater status within academic circles and was regarded as having the finest book reviews on Asian subjects anywhere. To recognise this, in 1982 the British Academy made a grant of £1,000 towards its costs.

Wheeler, in his initial enthusiasm, considered the possibility of merging the Journal with that of the Royal Asiatic Society. However, similar to other amalgamation schemes with that Society, this proved impracticable, their respective approaches differing too broadly. But he did publish in the Journal a number of articles on Soviet writings on Central Asia, whose provenance was his own Research Centre. He resigned from Chairmanship of the board in January 1965; subsequent holders of that office are given in the Annex.

At the start of 1970 the Journal was given a new title, Asian Affairs, and new serial numbers. The previous title, Royal Central Asian Society Journal, was misleading over the area covered and was limiting its appeal. In any case it was not the Journal, but the Society, that was Royal!

In February 1969 Mrs West resigned; three short-term editors replaced her, none lasting the course, and under her new married name, Mrs K. Beckett, she had repeatedly to be recalled to fill the gaps. In October 1975 Mrs Peggie Robertson settled to the position for six years. In October 1984 Mr Robert Longmire, after a career spent mostly in the Foreign and Commonwealth Office, became editor. In his tenure of eight years he raised the standing of the Journal to an even higher internationally acknowledged level. He fought a terminal illness to see his last edition through the press days before he died, a moving example of his steadfast devotion. Dr Victor Funnell and Mr John Shipman followed for short periods before Ms Susan Pares became editor in January 1997, holding the position to June 2001, when Mr Michael Sheringham took her place. Thanks to a generous donation of £5,000 from Shell in 1997, the editing system for the Journal was computerised and all material sent to the printers, Santype International, on disk. The Editorship and membership of the Board are responsible positions. The content of the work they supervise has had countless readers in over fifty countries and the international standing of the Society lies to a large degree in their hands.

There is no space here to detail the vast range of subjects relating to Asia that have, during a century, appeared in the Journal. Virtually every country has been covered but with a preponderance on Arabia, Soviet Central Asia, South East Asia, China and Tibet, and always the Society's choice subject, Afghanistan. But the smaller countries have not been neglected; there have, for example, been at least three articles on the Maldive Islands. The content indexes themselves make fascinating reading and show a coverage of articles on such diverse subjects as exploration, mountaineering, archaeology, anthropology, religions (especially Islam), history and the 'Great Game', education, technology, rail and air routes, natural history, Asian feminism, current affairs generally, oil, industry, trade and economics. Since 1960 there has been some increase in the last five subjects but the balance has been kept. In 1939 there were 109 book reviews, and in 2000 161. As a consequence the articles became shorter and fewer in number.

In January 1963 a copy of an article on Tibet was sent to His Holiness the Dalai Lama, which brought a grateful reply. In January 1965 copies of the Journal, with articles on Iran, were sent to His Imperial Majesty the Shahanshah of Iran; as a result he became an Honorary Member the same year. Articles on Islam, transcribed from lectures, have been a prominent feature of the Society's publications from the outset and have evoked interest in the Muslim world. In 1906 Valentine Chirol lectured on Pan-Islamism at a time when Sultan Abdul Hamid was still seated on the Ottoman throne.<sup>2</sup> Other early articles were by such well known Islamic scholars as Professor D. S. Margoliouth,<sup>3</sup> the Afghan writer Sirdar Ikbāl Ali Shah,<sup>4</sup> and Professor H. A. R. Gibb.<sup>5</sup> In 1931 a series of three lectures on Islam 'From the Sudan to Western China' was proposed with Mr Mohammed Ali Jinnah, King Feisal of Iraq and the British Muslim Mr Marmaduke Pickthall as speakers. In the event only the latter spoke.<sup>6</sup> Another British Muslim, Lord Healey, wrote in 1924 of his experiences in performing the Haj.<sup>7</sup> Lectures on Islam, written up as articles, have been carried regularly in the Journal ever since. In 1989 an advance copy of an article by Mr Hugh Leach on contemporary Islam was sent to the Society's Patron, the Prince of Wales, because of his known interest in the subject.<sup>8</sup>

A popular feature of the Journal is the obituaries; an enthralling volume could be made from a collection. They were written by friends, most often former colleagues, of the deceased, who brought out less-known aspects of a person's life. They were not drawn from Who's Who entries. The first obituary, that of the Society's founding chairman, General Sir Thomas Gordon, appeared in 1914, followed in 1915 by that of the Society's founder, Dr Cotterell Tupp. The nine-page obituary of Viscount Allenby, written by Sir John Shea, one of his Divisional Commanders in Palestine, is the longest any member of the Society has received,<sup>9</sup> though as pertinent to the understanding of his character was Field Marshal Lord Chetwode's address at the Annual Dinner in 1937. Sir Henry Dobbs, who replaced Sir Percy Cox as High Commissioner in Iraq, rated nine pages and the Arabian explorer Mr H. St J. B. Philby five, written by four separate Arabian scholars who knew him and could interpret his complex character.<sup>10</sup> There have also been obituaries of many prominent Asian rulers and statesmen.

Some obituaries were especially dramatic, others entertaining. That of the Reverend Oskar Hermansson describes how in 1933 he narrowly escaped execution by a Chinese firing squad at Yarkand,<sup>11</sup> and the obituary of Lieut Colonel John English Eadie by Professor Charles Beckingham conveys the delightful eccentricities developed by many members after long years of bachelor service in the East.<sup>12</sup>

The Journal is essentially the Society's 'Flagship'. It is the vehicle by which the Society is known both nationally and internationally and links the large overseas membership to the parent body. As the Chairman, Sir Arthur de la Mare, said at the 1980 Annual Dinner: 'If we did not have the Journal, we would be a very small society, able to cater only to those members who live either in London or near enough to London to be able to attend our lectures. It is entirely because of the Journal that we are able to get members literally in all five continents.' And a study of the Journal indexes will reinforce a remark made by Lord Curzon in 1924: 'Your Journal is a splendid production . . . its papers are written by experts and they contain information which could not be found anywhere else in the world.'

THE LIBRARY

Our Library continues to be the jewel in the Society's crown

Lieut Colonel A. P. H. B. Fowle, Hon. Sec., AGM 1993

The idea of a library was announced at the Annual General Meeting in June 1920 by the Honorary Secretary, Lieut Colonel A. C. Yate. 'We have reached a time when we are considering forming a library and a collection of photographs and lantern slides.' This was followed by a circular in November asking for contributions: 'The central subject of the Society's study is the Middle East, which should first and foremost be represented on its bookshelves. The Near and Far East are the complements of the Middle.' 'Middle East', in the Society's terms, then meant the 'centre of the East', i.e. Central Asia.

The first response to this request was received in February 1921 when Major H. L. Haughton of the 36th Sikhs donated a Chinese currency note of the reign of the Emperor Hung Wu, the first ruler of the Ming dynasty. This was followed by a trickle of a dozen or so books. The first substantial gift of 152 books, together with a bookcase, was made by Lady Trotter from the estate of her late husband, Sir Henry Trotter, who had been the Society's Chairman from 1917 to 1919; and the second a contribution from Sir Percy Sykes, which included an autographed copy of Dr Wolff's A Mission to Bokhara 1843-45.

This embryonic collection revealed the lack of any substantial shelf space in the modest office at 74 Grosvenor Street, occupied by courtesy of the Royal Asiatic Society (RAS), the Society's hosts. The problem was alleviated, though not solved, by moving to a larger office within the same premises. In 1922 Mr Roland Michell, who had recently joined the Society, volunteered to become the first Honorary Librarian. By 1923 the Library consisted of 485 volumes and 75 pamphlets. There were further gifts in the following two years.<sup>1</sup>

It would be tedious to list all the individual donors, even if there were a complete record, but it seems only right to acknowledge for posterity, either in the text or in the notes, the generosity of those who have made major contributions. This relies on sketchy records and many will be unintentionally omitted.

In June 1925 Mrs R. W. Frazer (formerly Miss Hughes), after retiring as secretary of the RAS, offered to take on the Honorary Librarianship in place of Mr Michell. Cataloguing the growing collection, she found there were some forty books not strictly of Asian interest. These were offered for sale to members at 2/6d, but as there were no takers they were sent to the Prison Library at Wandsworth. Since the collection included such tomes as The Flora of Niger by Joseph Hooker, 1849, one wonders how many were read by the inmates. Mrs Frazer was followed in the honorary post of Librarian by Mr A. C. Wratishaw in 1927 and in 1928 by Miss Ella Sykes.

At the end of 1928 a proposal was made that the Society should approach the Carnegie Trust for an allowance over the next five years to establish a proper library. Colonel S. F. Newcombe, a member of Council and a representative of the Trust, advised the Trustees against it, arguing that the Society's Library had yet to carry sufficient books of value. Another member of Council, Sir Arnold Wilson, who had had experience of the Trust, warned against the idea on the grounds that accepting Carnegie money placed restrictions on the use of the library. The idea was then shelved. A letter to Sir William Forster of the India Office Library asked if members could use that library and whether it would lend the Society books for a given period. Sir William stalled the proposal by adopting the useful formula of asking the joint librarians to 'look into it' and the idea does not seem to have been pursued. Rather, Council resolved to continue to build the library as previously, by encouraging the gifts of books, either directly or by bequest, and asking reviewers to return their copies. This has been the policy ever since and in fact relatively few books have been purchased.

In 1929 the Society moved to its own quarters at 77 Grosvenor Street, which provided facilities for a reading room and library. The new shelves were soon filled by 'the most valuable gift of books, almost a library in itself', part of the collection of Lieut Colonel A. C. Yate, the Society's late indefatigable Honorary Secretary, which were presented by his son in his father's memory.

In July 1930 Lieut General Sir Raleigh Egerton became the Honorary Librarian, succeeded in the following year by Colonel J. K. Tod. By the end of 1932 a further surplus of duplicated and irrelevant books had built up. Instead of bombarding prison inmates with obscure florae, this surplus was divided between the Royal Empire Society and the Witwatersrand Library in South Africa.

By 1935 the Library comprised some 2,150 volumes. In June 1940, with the threat of German bombing, the Library was divided up for safekeeping. The bulk was placed in the cellars of the Society's then headquarters at Clarges Street, whilst some of the rarer volumes were stored in the homes of members living in the country. But the most valuable were placed in the warehouse of the Society's printers, Billing and Sons, at Guildford. As mentioned earlier a direct hit by an incendiary bomb destroyed irreplaceable archival material as well as ninety-four of the most precious books.<sup>2</sup>

Council decided that little could be done about this disaster until the war was over. Meanwhile, members were asked to scour second-hand bookshops for replacements and Francis Edwards, the antiquarian bookseller, undertook to value for insurance purposes the books destroyed. As a result over the years many of the books have been reinstated.<sup>3</sup>

In June 1945 the dispersed books were gathered and the Library again functioned normally. In the same year Lieut Colonel F. M. Bailey became Honorary Librarian. It cannot be said that librarianship attracts the prosaic. Both Bailey and his predecessor, Colonel Tod, had had as adventurous lives as any in the Society or outside it.

The end of the war saw more additions to the Library. The bequest of Sir Charles Bell, the famous Tibetologist, added 250 rare books on Tibet; his diaries followed in 1948. A large part of Sir Percy Sykes's library was presented by his widow, Lady Sykes, on his death. In 1950 the Himalayan explorer Lieut Colonel R. C. F. Schomberg gave 50 books and a collection of glass slides, clearing his effects, perhaps, before being ordained as a Catholic priest.<sup>4</sup> There was traffic the other way. In 1950 the Foreign Office Arabic Language School, MECAS, in the Lebanon, which had supplied the Society with a steady stream of recruits, asked that in future they be sent any surplus books.

In 1960 Mr Frank de Halpert took over as Honorary Librarian from Colonel F. M. Bailey, who had retired to Norfolk. He made a detailed survey of acquisitions which, excluding the bound Journals and miscellanea, now amounted to 4,052 books. The majority were on India and Pakistan (618) followed numerically by China and Korea, the Middle East and the Arab World, Turkey, Tibet and Central Asia. Advice was sought from a professional librarian, Miss Mary Piggott, lecturer at the School of Librarianship and Archives of University College, London. Her recommendations included the need for more shelves (easier said than done given the limited space); books to be sub-arranged by subject matter within their geographical shelves (this was not adopted, it being preferred to shelve them alphabetically under authors); a classified subject catalogue should be made and, for security reasons, a separate list of books made in addition to the card index. Two student librarians assisted by two lady members worked voluntarily during the summer vacation to put these measures into effect. The Library has always relied upon voluntary help from members and in this respect particular mention must be made of the endeavours in recent years of Mr John da Silva, Mrs Merilyn Hywel-Jones and Mr Murray Graham.

By 1961 the Library numbered some 4,500 volumes, including in this increase 150 books on the Far East given by Brigadier E. V. Bowra 'in memory of his father and grandfather'. In the following year the explorer and scholar Mr Douglas Carruthers left a most valuable collection of 215 books on Central Asia and the Arab world. His modest bookplate will be familiar to borrowers. A note left with the donation read: 'The whole of my collection risked complete destruction when on 30 August 1940 the first enemy bomb to be dropped in Norfolk fell within ten yards of my library room at Barmer Hall, Kings Lynn, the target being Bircham Newton aerodrome one mile away.' In 1962 Sir Roger Hollis presented 85 books on the Far East, and a further 40 on the same area were donated by Mr E. M. Gull. In that year alone 405 books came to the Library from legacies.

In December 1962 the first Library Committee was formed, comprising the Honorary Librarian and initially two or three other members with separate geographical experience. The committee invited Mr S. C. Sutton, Librarian at the India Office Library, to join. On his retirement his place was taken by Miss Joan Lancaster, also a Director of the India Office Library. The committee was authorised by Council to spend up to £100 per annum on new books if it felt it necessary.

In 1963 Sotheby's valued the Library at £8,826, compared with £1,525 in 1947. Bequests continued to add to its numbers and in 1965 a total of 158 additional volumes were received. The time had come for some major weeding and 330 books were removed from the shelves that year and sold.

At the end of 1967 the stalwart Frank de Halpert resigned on reaching the age of eighty-four. His place was taken by Mr John Massey-Stewart, who approached his duties with zeal. As an experiment he kept the Library open until 6.30 p.m. on the first and last Monday of each month. The trial was not a success, though more books were borrowed than previously, reaching around 300 a year. Undaunted, Massey-Stewart continued with his crusade to put the Society's Library on the scholarly map, pointing out that its collection on Afghanistan, Mongolia, Mesopotamia, Turkestan and Tibet included uniquely rare works, some the envy even of the British Museum. In 1973 he contributed an article to the Journal about the twelve volumes of the Hakluyt Society's publications of travel narratives. These had just been presented to the Library by Mrs Elinor Sinclair, daughter of the late Sir Percy Sykes. After his successful tenure of eleven years, Massey-Stewart's place was taken in 1978 by Mr Michael Pollock, then at the India Office Library. He remains in office at the time of writing, serving jointly as Librarian of the Royal Asiatic Society.

In January 1969 Viscount Furness gave on long loan some fifty rare books on Mongolia. But a proposal by the Anglo-Mongolian Society ten years later that the whole of their library should be housed with the Society's, for the joint use of both, was turned down for lack of space.

In the 1980s there were valuable bequests from the estates of three of the Society's foremost scholars. C. J. Edmonds, an authority on the Kurds, left a large part of his library, as did Sir Olaf Caroe, one of the last Pro-Consuls of the former British Indian Empire, and Lieut Colonel Geoffrey Wheeler, the acknowledged expert on Soviet Central Asia.

At this time the Society was facing serious financial difficulties and Council was forced to scotch rumours that it intended to sell the Library to solve the problem. No doubt some saw this as tempting, since in 1980 it had been revalued at between £80,000 and £100,000. But as the Chairman, Sir Arthur de la Mare, made plain, 'to abolish the Library would be to destroy the Society'. He emphasised its uniqueness, pointing out that its collection ranged from the seventeenth century to the present as well as archival material dating back to 1823. That apart, the Library is a factor in the Society maintaining its educational charitable status.

In December 1985 the Society moved its offices from Devonshire Street to its present location at Canning House in Belgrave Square. By then the total number of volumes held, many in boxes, had reached nearly 6,000.

As the new premises offered less wall space for shelving another weeding was necessary. A good many books discarded were duplicates, or dealt with areas outside the Society's strict geographical remit. These were sold so that by the time of the move the number had been reduced to about 4,500 volumes, including the Journals.

Thanks to the generosity of members, gifts and legacies continued. In 1990 Colonel Gerald Morgan, a former member of the Library Committee and biographer of the celebrated nineteenth-century Central Asian explorer Ney Elias, left £2,500 to the Society for the use of its Library, as well as some Tibetan artefacts. In 1992 there were contributions from the estate of Mr Edward Sykes (son of Sir Percy), and a collection of rare seventeenth to nineteenth-century leather-bound travel books was sent from the library in Italy of Major R. C. Murphy shortly before he died. In 1998 Mr Jeremy Wilson, editor of the recently published 1922 text of T. E. Lawrence's Seven Pillars of Wisdom, generously presented the Society with one of the limited Collectors' Editions of this work.

A general view of the Library

The move to Canning House focused the Library Committee on the problem of space and it put forward a proposal to Council that the Society's archival collection (details of which are outlined in the following chapter) should be handed to the India Office Library on permanent loan. The Committee argued that the latter had better facilities for the preservation of such material and that it would be more readily available to the public there. Council rejected robustly this proposal, feeling it to be a surrender of a major asset and that it would dissuade others from leaving material to the Society. It would be better, it argued, to try to obtain a grant from some organisation to fund preservation. A bid to obtain such funds from the Barakat Trust in 1999 failed because that body aids only Islamic collections. Since 1997 members of the National Decorative and Fine Arts Society (NADFAS) have been active cleaning and carrying out minor repairs to ailing volumes. An 'Adopt a Book' scheme was launched for volumes requiring more major repairs, at an average cost to the donor of £30.

The editor of the Society's Journal currently receives some 200 books each year for review, though not all undergo that treatment. Returned review copies, where appropriate, are added to the Library and this provides a steady increase of up-to-date publications. There have been suggestions that the Society's Library should concentrate its collection on such recent works and that the library of the Royal Asiatic Society should be the custodian for the more antiquarian volumes. Three things need to be said here. Firstly, the majority of books borrowed or read in situ by researchers are the older volumes, especially those on travel. Secondly, and this may be the reason for that, modern books are available at provincial libraries. And thirdly, not unimportantly, the indigenous wealth of the Library, and thus of the Society itself, rests in its antiquarian collection. A balance must be kept and the Library Committee is active in keeping the shelves stocked with quality modern publications. It is certainly not a 'dead library', but at the same time it cannot ignore the fact that many members do enjoy browsing in antiquity.

At the time of the centenary the Library, all but bursting at its seams, carried 5,320 titles. The coverage includes travel, biography, history, archaeology, religion, current affairs and economics, but not literature. It may well be the Society's 'Jewel in the Crown', but it is an under-used jewel even though non-members may, on recommendation, make use of it. And whilst no armchair traveller could ask for more than to disappear into the vanished world found on its shelves, the serious researcher will find, the books apart, uniquely rich material lying in a century's worth of the Journals.

THE ARCHIVES

by John Shipman

Our archives date back to 1823 . . . We must never surrender such a major asset.
Sir Arthur de la Mare, Chairman, 1983

The archive derives from the piecemeal accumulation of bequests and donations over many decades. The collection is modest by the standards of other learned societies, but it is rich and diverse enough to intrigue both generalist and specialist. Although the Society's limited means has hitherto precluded the systematic organisation and maintenance of this resource, the Society, until comparatively recently, continued to solicit donations of material from members. However, with the passing of the generation who were born, lived or served in the outposts of empire, the well of benefaction has run dry – or almost dry – and the time has come to concentrate attention on the assets which the Society holds. These, for the most part, are listed, but they remain uncatalogued. Some items are of unknown provenance, while the source of others is only partially known or a matter of conjecture.

It would be tedious to attempt a comprehensive survey of the archive. What follows, therefore, is an impressionistic review, arranged alphabetically, of some of its highlights and curiosities, with notes on the personalities involved.

The Bailey Collection

The Society holds some 300 glass slides of photographs taken by the explorer and naturalist, Lieut Colonel Frederick Marshman (Eric) Bailey (1882–1967). They relate to his travels, on and off duty, in Central Asia.

At an early stage in his career, Bailey concluded that 'nothing important happens in India itself. To get on one must learn about the neighbouring countries.'<sup>1</sup> And so he did. He served with the Younghusband expedition to Tibet in 1904, and later, in 1918–1919, travelled via Kashgar to Tashkent and other parts of Russian Turkestan.<sup>2</sup> After the First World War he was appointed Political Officer, Sikkim, when he had the opportunity to revisit Tibet and to explore Bhutan. He was later Resident in Kashmir. Most of the original photographs, together with Bailey's papers, are held in the British Library. Bailey's wife, the Hon. Mrs Irma Bailey, also presented the Society with an album of sketches (and a few photographs) belonging to her grandfather, Lieut Colonel Sir William Everett (1844–1908) who served as Consul-General at Erzerum, Turkey, 1882–1888. Everett had a trained eye and was an accomplished artist; his Turkish sketches and watercolours are of exceptional interest.

The Bell Papers

As Political Officer in Sikkim for most of the period from 1908 to 1920, Sir Charles Bell (1870–1945) was directly responsible for British relations with Tibet. A leading scholar of Tibet's language, history and culture, he was the friend and biographer of the Thirteenth Dalai Lama. The papers bequeathed by his widow – in addition to many of his books – comprise a random collection of photographs, printed material and documents mainly relating to Tibet. They include original correspondence ending with Bell's magisterial letter to The Times of 8 August 1935 in which he argued that the authentic Tibetan name for Mt Everest was Kang Chamolung. Unfortunately, the most important item, a typescript of the diary which he kept during his Mission to Lhasa in 1920–1921, has disappeared.

The Bourdillon Bequest

Two albums containing photographs of exceptional size and quality comprise this bequest by the Misses Bourdillon in 1949. They were taken during the Younghusband Mission of 1903–1904 by John Claude White (1853–1918), a Public Works Department engineer on loan to the Indian Political Department. White had been sent to Sikkim in 1888–1889 with a British military expedition tasked to eject an invading Tibetan force. Appointed to the newly created post of Political Officer, Sikkim, he was subsequently given responsibility for relations with Tibet and Bhutan, and assumed he would conclude his career in command of the British Mission to Lhasa. His disappointment at the appointment of Younghusband embittered his last few years in Gangtok.<sup>3</sup>

The Bowra Bequest

In 1961 Brigadier E. V. Bowra<sup>4</sup> donated printed, manuscript and photographic material which had belonged to his grandfather E. C. M. Bowra (1841–1874) and to his father C. A. V. Bowra (1869–1947), both of whom had served with distinction in the Chinese Maritime Customs Service. In 1860 Edward Bowra, as a quixotic, lion-hearted youth of nineteen, postponed getting a job in order to join Garibaldi's Red Shirts in their fight to liberate Italy. Shortly after his recruitment into the Imperial Chinese Customs Service in 1863, he volunteered to join General Gordon in the storming of Soochow, then in the hands of the Taiping rebels. He became a brilliant Chinese linguist and scholar, serving both as interpreter and commissioner in Canton and Ningpo before his sudden death at the age of thirty-three, while on leave in Kent.<sup>5</sup> His papers include his History of the Kwang-Tung Province of the Chinese Empire (Hong Kong 1872) with manuscript annotations, and two albums of photographs of China in the 1860s. These contain some striking images of the temples, monuments and other buildings of old Peking, including the then recently sacked Summer Palace, as well as scenes of Ningpo and Canton. Cecil Bowra's unpublished manuscript Some Episodes in the History of Amoy is embellished with annotations in his fine Chinese script.

The Chapman Papers

Shortly before his death in 1962, Sir Richard Maconachie, a former Indian Civil Servant and diplomat, presented a collection of sketches, watercolours and photographs which had been given to him during the Second World War by 'a lady whom I knew slightly' (but whom he did not name); she had told him 'that they had belonged to a relation of hers – a Colonel Chapman ... who had been a member of the Forsyth Mission'.

General Sir Edward Francis Chapman (1840–1926) had an eventful career spent largely in India. As a Captain in the Quarter Master General's Department, Lucknow, he was appointed Secretary of the Forsyth Mission to Yarkand and Kashgar (1873–1874), with responsibility for administration and transport. He faced the daunting task of organising the passage of '300 souls and 400 animals' along the Karakoram caravan route from Leh to Yarkand, across four of the highest passes in the world, in below-freezing temperatures. The ostensible purpose of the Mission, led by Sir Douglas Forsyth and including two future chairmen of the Society, Sir Thomas Gordon and Sir Henry Trotter, was to negotiate a commercial treaty with Yakub

Beg who in 1867 had established himself as the independent ruler of much of Chinese Turkestan. The unstated purpose of the exercise was to counter the spread of Russian influence in a region flanking India's Northern Frontier. Before joining the Mission, Chapman took a crash course in photography with Messrs Bourne and Shepherd in Simla, where he later sent his negatives for printing (110 in all, including a few taken by Henry Trotter). Chapman's photographs, copies of which were circulated with the Mission's official report (1875), were the first to be taken of 'native' society in Chinese Turkestan, and are of considerable historical and ethnographic interest. They are usefully (and delightfully) complemented by Chapman's watercolour sketches, somewhat naïve in style and execution but with illuminating, often humorous notes in his flowing hand.<sup>6</sup>

The Enriquez Papers

In Upper Burma, in the early 1950s, a French travel writer, Joseph Kessel, visited a retired Indian Army Major at his home on a spur of jungle-covered hillside overlooking the lakeside town and valley of Mogok, famous for its ruby mines. Kessel wrote, 'spread out before us was an enclosed world where everything was orderly, formal, elegant'. On the terrace above a stairway of lawns and flower-beds leading up to the teak-built house, 'we saw a tall, upright old man ... [wearing] a tweed sports coat, flannel trousers and a woollen tie, as though he was in Surrey or Kent'. Kessel noted that everything inside the spacious, gracefully proportioned house – which, with its contents, had miraculously survived the Japanese occupation intact – was in meticulous order. 'Yet here, just as amid the lawns and flowers of the formal garden, one could sense the pain of solitude and silence.' The Major's knowledge of the land and people 'was something far beyond learning ... it embraced the customs, the language, the history, the legends, the flora and fauna ... Between Upper Burma and this old gentleman there was a sort of marriage of the flesh and spirit.' Kessel did not identify the Major, only the name of his house, 'Lone Spur'.<sup>7</sup>

More than thirty years later, at the suggestion of her cousin, Lady Greenhill,<sup>8</sup> Mrs Diana Burnard presented the Society with a collection of printed material and manuscripts which she had been given by an unnamed acquaintance. The papers related to Burma and had been written by a Major C. M. Enriquez. Colin Metcalfe Enriquez was born in 1884, and followed his father, Lieut Colonel Albert Dallas Enriquez (1854–1940), into the Indian Army in 1905, serving with the 21st Punjabis in Northern India and with the Kachin Rifles in Burma. His love affair with Burma began in 1913 with his first posting to the province, and he decided to retire there in 1928. Enriquez's first book was published as early as 1910,<sup>9</sup> followed by numerous articles and short stories on the history, social life and folklore of the Burmese people written in a light, conversational, sometimes moralising vein, under the pseudonym of 'Theophilus'. Why 'Theophilus'? He adopted the name from his mother's grandfather, Sir Theophilus Metcalfe, the British Resident in Delhi at the outbreak of the Indian Mutiny in 1857. In 1930 Enriquez had a son by his Burmese wife, Ma Me Tin. The boy was baptised Theophilus John Metcalfe Enriquez, to whom he dedicated his book Khyberie in Burma: The Adventures of a Mountain Pony (1939), as he had an companion volume Khyberie: The Story of a Pony on the Indian Frontier (1934) to his daughter Alice Theophila Metcalfe Enriquez.

When the Japanese invaded Burma in 1942, Enriquez was forced to leave Mogok for India. A Japanese linguist, he spent the next three years in Delhi, serving in the Far Eastern Bureau of the Ministry of Information as supervisor of its Japanese Section. Here he befriended a twenty-five-year-old Japanese American from Hawaii, Ernest Sunau Miyabara, whom Enriquez later appointed his literary executor. A visit to Miyabara in Hawaii resulted in an unpublished manuscript, Hawaiian Interlude (1948), dedicated to 'Ernie'. Other unpublished manuscripts include an account of Enriquez's time in Delhi, whimsically drafted as the reminiscences of a dog, 'Skipper', and a critique (1946) of Britain's post-war policy in Burma, dedicated to 'our American allies who fought and died for the Liberation of Burma'.

Enriquez joined the Society in 1946, unaware that long after his death these papers would find their way to its archive.

The Fraser Bequest

From 1896 to 1902 Sir Stuart Mitford Fraser (1864–1963) was tutor and mentor to the young Maharaja of Mysore, Krishnaraja Wadiya Bahadur (1884–1940). Fraser was Resident in Mysore 1905–1910, and in Hyderabad 1914–1919. The most interesting of several items presented to the Society by his daughter is a leather-bound volume entitled Diary of HH The Maharaja of Mysore: Provincial Tour 1901–1902. This is a detailed account of a fifty-day tour, covering 650 miles, undertaken by Krishnaraja Wadiya (then aged seventeen) accompanied by Stuart Fraser and other officials. The diary, which includes several photographs, is written in Fraser's hand but drafted as if it were the young Maharaja's own personal memoir of the tour. Fraser also drafted for the guidance of his young charge a volume of Notes on Law, to which Krishnaraja appears to have made some additional entries in his own hand. In 1902 Lord Curzon visited Mysore to formally invest Krishnaraja with full ruling powers; the latter, as sovereign of the second most important princely state in India, attended Curzon's Delhi Durbar the following year. The Bequest also includes an album of photographs printed to commemorate the visit in 1906 of the Prince and Princess of Wales to see a wild elephant hunt (kheddah) in the Kakankota forest of Mysore, and a file of papers relating to Fraser's time in Hyderabad.

Drawn in ink on a fragile sheet of greaseproof paper, Lawrence's sketch map shows a section of the route between Wejh and Aqaba taken by Sharif Nasir's expedition which culminated in the capture of Aqaba in July 1917. It embraced the expedition's route from a crossing of the Hejaz Railway between Dis'ad and Al-Mu'adhdham to Imshash Arfaja in Wadi Sirhan about 60 miles west of Jauf. Lawrence was the first westerner to travel this northward route, during the course of which he crossed the west-east tracks of Guarmani, Carruthers, Musil and Gertrude Bell.

Lawrence had no direct links with the Society, but many of his friends were members, through one of whom, Dr D. G. Hogarth (Lawrence's mentor since his Oxford days and first Director of the Arab Bureau), he established contact with Douglas Carruthers, the probable source of this copy of his traverse. During the First World War, Carruthers, whilst Honorary Secretary of the Royal Geographical Society (RGS), was engaged in map making of northern Arabia. Throughout the Arab Revolt he was in contact with the Arab Bureau in Cairo, which led to his first, indirect, contact with Lawrence. In early 1918 the Arab Bulletin noted that data and conclusions about the Sirhan and Jauf depression, which Carruthers had submitted to the Arab Bureau the previous October, might be modified in the light of 'more recent observations by Major T. E. Lawrence'. After the war Lawrence and Carruthers corresponded a good deal, chiefly on geographical matters; Lawrence's last letter to Carruthers was in May 1934.<sup>11</sup>

The sketch map has two annotations by Lawrence. First, a note of identification, the date being that of the traverse rather than that of the sketch itself:

Hejaz Rly. to Wadi Sirhan 1:5000,000. Compass traverse.
Names by Auda Abu Tayi. May 1917. TEL

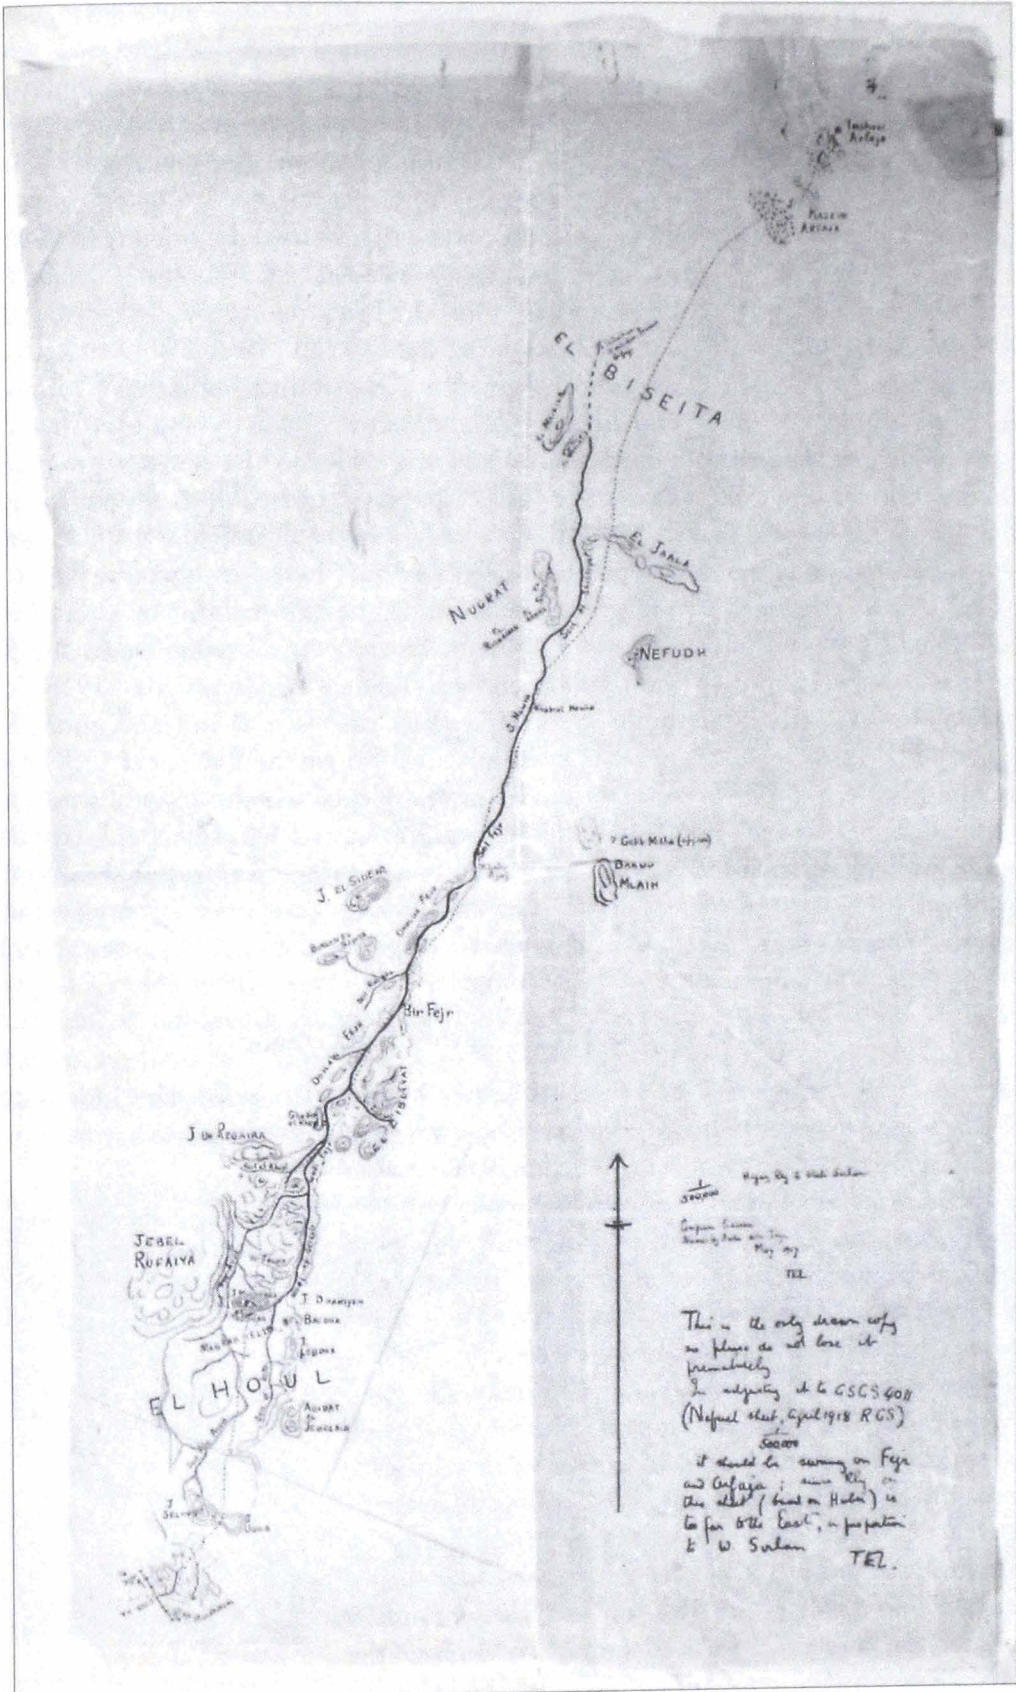

Second, a cautionary note to the user which suggests that it was drawn by Lawrence after April 1918, probably post-war:

This is the only drawn copy so please do not lose it prematurely. In adjusting it to GSGS 4011 (Nefud Sheet, April 1918 RGS) 1/500,000 it should be swung on Fejr and Affaja: since Rly on this sheet (based on Huber) is too far to the East, in proportion to Wadi Sirhan TEL

In a later reference to the traverse, Lawrence wrote to Hogarth, now Keeper of the Ashmolean, in June 1922:

You know Carruthers' address . . . Do you think he would like the enclosed? Your copy of the whole will come later, but this covers the scrap of traverse which I once worked out and sent him. If he doesn't want it I'd like it back. I'm conscious of a horrible word about geographers in the middle of it: but perhaps he'll excuse it . . .

'The enclosed' was an extract from the 1922 Oxford text of Seven Pillars of Wisdom<sup>12</sup> (Chaps XXXIX–LIV of the 1935 Cape edition); 'the scrap of traverse' is the subject of this note. Although dated 1917, it is not the original sketch. That is to be found in a diary kept by Lawrence from 17 January to 28 June 1917, now in the British Library (Add. MSS 45915). Written in pencil on the back of Army Form C2121 Message and Signal pads, the entries record topographical and other details of journeys made by Lawrence in that period. Times of marches and halts, direction and bearings of prominent features are all noted and were later used by Lawrence when he translated the rough sketch into the traverse which he sent to Carruthers. His description of the terrain and notes about his companions are clearly the bare bones of his published narrative.

Lawrence's sketch map [RSAA Archives]

Carruthers (1882–1963), explorer, naturalist and writer, joined the Society in 1935 and left it a valuable collection of his books and maps. His Arabian Adventure: To the Great Nefud in Quest of the Oryx, published in 1935, was the full account of his historic journey in 1909–1910, the aim of which, as he reported to the RGS in March 1910, was ‘to travel over and map out the blank that exists between the Hejaz Railway and the Wadi Sirhan, to determine the western limits of the Great Nefud, and to visit the oasis of Taima’.

In his Preface to Arabian Adventure Carruthers acknowledged Lawrence’s co-operation over many years in an attempt to answer the geographical questions about, and improve the maps of, the area. The End Papers of the book are a map of The Shararat Wilderness and Western Nefud and, reflecting Lawrence’s contribution, have considerably more detail than the RGS 1910 Sketch Map of Northern Arabia showing the explorations by Carruthers.

The Nefud Sheet of April 1918, referred to by Lawrence, was compiled at the RGS, almost certainly by Carruthers, and published by Ordnance Survey in May 1918. It was entered in the Map Room at the RGS in June 1918, and is now indexed under Saudi Arabia. It appears to have been a late wartime addition to the five-sheet GSGS 4011 Ottoman Empire 1:500,000 Series covering Mecca to Aleppo which was published for the Arab Bureau by the Survey of Egypt, under authority from the War Office, in early 1917. Today’s maps confirm Lawrence’s cautionary note that the Hejaz Railway as shown on the Nefud Sheet (at Kala’at al-Mu’adhdham) was too far East – by about twenty-two miles. However Lawrence’s sketch, swung as he suggested, reduces that error by more than half.

Major General Sir Charles MacGregor

MacGregor (1840–1887) rose to become Quarter Master General of the Indian Army (1880–1885) and founder of its Intelligence Department. He proved fearless in battle, and between the Indian Mutiny and the Second Afghan War there were few campaigns in which he did not take part. He was a careerist with a talent for self-advertisement unsurpassed by any of his contemporaries. To bring his name to notice, he bombarded the press with letters, wrote many unsolicited reports, and even invented a new type of saddle; and at the despairing suggestion of his colleagues, he bought his own trumpet and learnt how to blow it! The subjects which he tackled ranged from Clandestine Prostitution (which doubtless won him a wide, if surreptitious, readership) to Notes on Field Equipment of Troops for Service among Mountains. MacGregor, who had travelled in Baluchistan and Persia in the mid-1870s, became a passionate advocate of a ‘forward policy’ to counter the perceived Russian threat to British India. In 1883 this led him to write one report too many: The Defence of India, a detailed, supposedly confidential, assessment of the likely strengths and deployment of Russian and British Indian forces in the event of an outbreak of war between them. MacGregor concluded that 'there can never be a real settlement of the Russo-Indian question till Russia is driven out of the Caucasus and Turkistan'. To pressurise Calcutta and the Gladstone administration in London, MacGregor imprudently leaked his report to the press. The ensuing furore dashed his hopes of further promotion, and he died a sick and embittered man in 1887.<sup>13</sup>

Sir Charles MacGregor, Quarter Master General of the Indian Army, 1880–1885 [RSAA Archives]

His diary of the Second (mistakenly entitled 'Third') Afghan War (1879–1880) and other printed papers were presented by his widow<sup>14</sup> in 1923, together with a photograph of MacGregor in full military fig. Lieut Colonel A. C. Yate, then Honorary Secretary of the Society, who had himself served in the Afghan campaign, felt moved to comment on the cover of the diary: 'That any officer should have dreamed of printing such an injudiciously-written diary as this, appears to me inexplicable; and yet here it is in print, and that unquestionably by MacGregor's own order. His own egotism and self-seeking and the way in which he writes about Sir F. Roberts [later Lord Roberts of Kandahar, whom MacGregor served as Chief of Staff] and in the worst taste, jar upon one's sense of what is right and manly and dignified. In fact the man on whom this book reflects the least credit is MacGregor himself. . .'<sup>15</sup>

The Schomberg Collection

Towards the end of his life, when he was about to train for the Roman Catholic priesthood, Lieut Colonel R. C. F. Schomberg (1880–1958) presented the Society with a collection of diaries, manuscripts, photographs and maps, and a substantial cache of glass slides. Reginald Schomberg won a DSO and Bar with the Seaforth Highlanders in Mesopotamia; but peacetime soldiering had diminishing appeal and he retired from the Army in 1928. During the next twenty years he devoted most of his time and energy to the exploration of remoter parts of Central Asia. His travels yielded four books in quick succession, and a host of articles in a variety of academic journals.<sup>16</sup>

An austere, self-deprecating man with a dry sense of humour, Schomberg was probably never happier than in the company of his 'Hunza men'; they alone were permitted to share the rigours of his journeys, except on one occasion during the summer of 1946 when he was joined for a few weeks in Ladakh by a British compatriot. Mrs Marianne Williams, as the young bride of an officer in the Frontier Constabulary, recalls meeting Schomberg when he came to stay with them in the mid-1940s: she found him a considerate guest but a man with little small talk.<sup>17</sup>

Schomberg's typescript diaries cover his travels in Chinese Turkestan between 1926–1929 and 1930–1931. He also left the Society typescript drafts of four unpublished books: Cold Deserts (1937), 'an account of a journey in the deserts of a no-man's land that lies in Western Tibet beyond the Karakoram and Ladakh mountains'; Baltistan Journey (1943–1944); Karakoram Finale (1945); and Tibetan Kashmir (1946). In addition to Schomberg's handwritten diary for 1945, the collection also includes thirteen letters from Sir Aurel Stein (1862–1943).<sup>18</sup> These letters, reflecting the close friendship between the two men, afford fascinating glimpses of Stein's thoughts and preoccupations during the last seven years of his prodigiously active life.<sup>19</sup>

The Shakespear Papers

The papers of Sir Richmond Shakespear (1812–1861) and other members of his extended family are the pride and centre-piece of the archive.<sup>20</sup> They include personal letters, official documents (British, Russian and Khivan), notebooks, journals and diaries. Richmond Shakespear was born into a family with a long tradition of military and civil service in India and Afghanistan, and, later, in Assam and the Gulf. Shakespear's closest schoolboy friend was his cousin, William Makepeace Thackeray, the future novelist; from India they were sent together to school in England. Richmond's brother, George, was the model for Thackeray's Joseph Sedley in Vanity Fair.

Shakespear's career spans a formative period in the consolidation of British power in India, in British India's relations with Afghanistan, and in the related development of Anglo-Russian rivalry in Central Asia. In 1840, during his early career in the Bengal Artillery, he was given the task of persuading the Khan of Khiva to release 416 Russian prisoners, whom he then led on a hazardous journey to St Petersburg. This resulted in the reciprocal release by Russia of 600 Khivan captives (earning Shakespear a place 'in the calendar of [Uzbek] saints'), deprived the Russians of a Decree dated Jumada 11 A.H. 1256 (31 July 1840) obtained by Richmond Shakespear from the Khan of Khiva, prohibiting Khivan subjects from buying Russian captives or raiding into Russian territory. Shakespear left Khiva on 15 August 1840, accompanied by 416 freed Russian prisoners, on a 500-mile march across the desert to Fort Nova Alexandroff on the eastern shore of the Caspian [RSAA Archives] pretext for renewing their attempt to annex Khiva, and effectively delayed their conquest of the Khanate until 1873. In 1841, on the recommendation of Lord Palmerston, Shakespear, aged twenty-nine, was knighted by Queen Victoria. The following year, during the First Afghan War, he was involved in the relief of Jalalabad, and later, during the Second Sikh War, he took part in the battle of Chillianwala. He ended his career as Agent to the Governor-General for Central India, conducting important negotiations with the celebrated Rani of Bhopal, Sikander Begum, before his death at Indore in 1861.<sup>21</sup>

The collection also includes the unpublished autobiography of Richmond's younger son, Lieut Colonel John Shakespear (1861–1942); the diaries which he kept 1880–1896 while serving as Superintendent of the Lushai Hills on the Assam/Burma border; the unfinished manuscript of a book, together with an album of photographs, about the military expeditions (1889–1890) which led to the incorporation of the Lushai Hills into British India;<sup>22</sup> a manuscript history of Manipur, possibly compiled from local sources by a native clerk, and an album of photographs taken in Manipur, where Shakespear was Resident 1905–1914. Most, if not all, of these papers were presented by his widow in 1949 and 1955.

The archive also holds a typescript copy of the journal kept by a distant relative, Captain W. H. I. Shakespear (1878–1915), during his historic journey in 1914 from Kuwait, where he was serving as Political Agent, across Central Arabia to Sinai.<sup>23</sup>

The Stevens Bequest

In February 1904, on the eve of the Russo-Japanese War, two Russian warships, steaming out of the Korean port of Chemulpo, were attacked by a Japanese squadron. The crippled warships limped back into the harbour; the dead and wounded were carried ashore; the remaining crew were evacuated in friendly European vessels; the warships were then scuttled. At the European cemetery in Chemulpo a burial service was held for the Russian dead. Scenes of what became known as the 'Chemulpo incident' are captured in several faded images in an album of photographs bequeathed by Miss Florence Stevens (1903–1976). The album had belonged to her father, Thomas Stevens, who served in the Imperial Japanese Maritime Customs, Korea, during, and perhaps beyond, the first decade of the twentieth century. There are pictures of Chemulpo, with its Customs house, British Consulate and uncluttered landscape; of Seoul, with its pagoda-roofed city gates and busy streets; of Koreans in their distinctive national dress; and of Japanese, whose increasing presence in Korea from 1905 signified the country's new and involuntary status as a Japanese protectorate.<sup>24</sup>

Glass Slides

Money has been found to meet the cost of producing photographic prints from the Society's collection of more than 1,000 glass slides. With the important exception of the Bailey and Schomberg collections, most of these are the legacy of illustrated lectures given to the Society in the 1920s and 1930s. Speakers – and there is only space to mention fewer than half their number – included D. McCallum on the Nairn Route (1925), Captain Eccles on Muscat and Oman (1927), D. Bourke-Borrowes on Persia under the Pahlavis (1928), G. M. Lees on Southern Kurdistan (1928), W. E. D. Allen on Georgia (1929), M. Vyvyan on Qazwin to Trebizond (1931), H. St J. Philby on Mecca and Medina (1933), J. G. French on Afghanistan (1933), E. B. Howell on the North West Frontier (1934), J. B. Glubb on the Bedouin of Northern Arabia (1935), and W. H. Ingrams on a Journey in the Hadhramaut (1936). Prints of these slides have now been made.

Photographic Albums

For armchair travellers favouring a further, perhaps more sedate excursion through time and space, two options are recommended: a tour of the Holy Land through a sepia lens of 1875; or, at perhaps a slightly later date, following a voyage through the Suez Canal to Bombay, a tour of the metropolitan splendours of Victorian India! These two albums are of unknown provenance. There is a third, however, which deserves special mention, not only because of its intrinsic interest but because it bears the signature of the Society's founder, Alfred Cotterell Tupps.<sup>25</sup> This is The Antiquities of Cambodia: A Series of Photographs Taken on the Spot by the renowned Scottish photographer and East Asian traveller, John Thomson (1837–1921). He was the first photographer to visit Angkor Wat, and his elation at seeing what has become one of the most important sites of ancient architecture in the world, can be imagined. The book, Thomson's first, is illustrated with albumen prints, including two panoramas, pasted into the text, and was published in Edinburgh in 1867 by Edmonston and Douglas, the foremost publishers of illustrated books in Scotland at that time.

This chapter could not have been written but for the voluntary efforts over the past few years of one or two members of the Society, principally Mrs Marilyn Hywel-Jones, who have laid the groundwork for the classification, filing, and – most urgent of all – the conservation of our archival papers by professional and expert hands.

THE DINNER CLUB

The Dinner Club . . . such a specific feature of the Society.

Major General Sir William Beynon, AGM, 1936

In the early 1920s the Society experimented with holding evening lectures, realising that lunchtime meetings could not be managed by all. They were initially of limited success because such events had to be wedged between the close of work and evening dining. Council, at their meeting on 13 October 1921, suggested that a solution to this problem would be to hold such meetings actually around a dinner. A sub-committee consisting of Sir Michael O'Dwyer, Sir Edward Penton, Sir Edmund Barrow and Captain G. C. Stephenson was appointed and reported favourably on the idea. But they proposed that it should be implemented in the form of a separate Dinner Club, an offshoot rather than a branch of the Society. Initially, selected members would be invited to join by Council, all of whom would be ex-officio members of this Club. Once a nucleus had been formed, the elected members would invite other members.

The idea had something of the hallmark of a secret society within a society. But this was excused on the basis that the concept behind the Club was 'to hear papers and hold discussions not suited to the general meetings'. The sub-committee became that of the new Club with Sir Michael O'Dwyer as Chairman and Captain Stephenson as Honorary Secretary.

Rules were drawn up and updated periodically. The opening subscription was 5/- per annum and the membership limited to seventy-five. An essential element of the rules was that the transactions of the Club's meetings should be treated as confidential and not used for publication. To emphasise its independence of the main Society it was agreed that the Club should pay an annual fee to the former to cover the cost of its clerical work, an arrangement which continues to the present. A more curious feature was to limit the number of lady members, and in the 1938 version of the rules to exclude them altogether unless by then already elected. This, as we shall see, led to an early feminist backlash. Within six months of its foundation forty-six male members had been elected to the newly-formed Club.

The first meeting was held on 4 May 1922 at the Imperial Restaurant, Regent Street, where, alternating with the Criterion Restaurant, Piccadilly, many subsequent dinners took place. The Society's Chairman, Lord Carnock, was asked to preside at this inaugural session at which fifty diners were present. The subject for discussion was 'The Kemal Movement' and Colonel Alfred Rawlinson was the opening speaker. The pattern, which continued to the outbreak of war, was for a main speaker, followed by other pre-announced speakers. It was then thrown open to the floor for further contributions or questions.

Reading through the list of subjects at the pre-war meetings, it can be seen that they reflected the political concerns of the time, especially the preoccupation with Central Asia and Turkey. In the 1920s there were talks on Soviet Russia and the Treaties of Sèvres and Angora (the Emir Abdullah of Trans-Jordan and his Prime Minister were guests); the situation in Turkestan; Mr H. St J. B. Philby and

Dr David Hogarth discussed British interests in Arabia, and Sir Valentine Chirol and Colonel Meinerzhagen the effect of the Fall of the Ottoman Caliphate on the Middle East. There were six talks on Afghanistan; Mr Clarmont Skrine and Captain Frank Kingdon Ward spoke on Russia, China and Afghanistan in Central Asia and Sir Gilbert Clayton on his mission to Ibn Saud and the Imam of Yemen. There were several on the internal affairs of India: the prohibition on such lectures in the main forum did not apply to the Dinner Club. During this period there were five talks on China, five on Iraq and four on Persia.

By 1926 the membership ceiling had been raised to 100, in 1937 to 120 and the subscription to 10/-. Guests were allowed up to a maximum per meeting of twelve, and at a charge of 2/- each. In 1929 Colonel Stewart Patterson took over as Honorary Secretary, succeeded in 1932 by Colonel Stewart Newcombe, who remained the mainstay of the Club until after the war.

During the 1930s the Club's sub-committee, showing a distinct misogynistic streak, repeatedly debated the question of lady membership. Already in 1928 a suggestion had been made that membership should be men only 'though ladies' nights might be arranged' and in 1929 the Committee declared firmly that the quota of lady members, at six, was full. In 1934 it further decided that there should be extra meetings 'to which no ladies should be admitted and if this was done discussion might be of a better quality'. Prior to a lecture by the Turkish ambassador, Tewfiq Bey, on 8 May 1934 a notice was issued that 'no ladies, even if already members, will be admitted'. During the winter of that year several meetings were held at the Army and Navy Club and its rules specifically forbade the presence of ladies. There is a note in the Dinner Club's minute book at that period: 'The last two meetings, without ladies, were the best attended in the season.' Yet despite this, two talks were actually given by ladies. In May 1933 Lady Evelyn Cobbold spoke on 'A Woman's Pilgrimage to Mecca'<sup>1</sup> and in March of the following year Miss Violet Conolly on 'The Industrialization of Persia'.

Unperturbed, the sub-committee continued its policy. In November 1936 it declared 'No exception to the rule of no lady members except as special honorary ones such as Miss Freya Stark'. This was made clear in Rule 4(b), re-drafted in 1938. Three ladies, however, Mrs Dulcie Sassoon, Mrs F. E. Storrs and Miss Ella Sykes, all long-standing members, insisted on their presence at a dinner talk in March 1937 by Sir Firoz Khan Noon on

RULES.

TITLE.

1. The Club shall be called the ROYAL CENTRAL ASIAN SOCIETY DINNER CLUB.

OBJECT.

2. The Club is instituted to afford opportunities for discussion on Central Asian and kindred topics.

ELECTION.

3. Persons with the necessary qualifications for membership, as stated hereunder, who desire to join the Dinner Club must be proposed and seconded by two members of the Club and elected by the Committee.

QUALIFICATION FOR MEMBERSHIP.

4. (a) The Membership shall be limited to 120, exclusive of Members and ex-Members of Council.

(b) All Members must be subscribers or honorary Members of the Royal Central Asian Society, and of British birth. Ladies shall not under ordinary circumstances, be eligible for election. Any Member ceasing to be a member of the Society thereby ceases to be a member of the Royal Central Asian Society Dinner Club.

(c) Members of the Royal Central Asian Society home from abroad on leave or on temporary duty shall be eligible for election as temporary additional Members of the Royal Central Asian Society Dinner Club.

(d) Every Member of the Club must undertake that any information that transpires shall be regarded as confidential and shall in no case be used for the purpose of publication.

GUESTS.

5. A Member is permitted to introduce a guest to any of the Club's Dinners, who, if desirous of doing so, may take part in the discussion, subject to the following conditions:—

(a) That the number of Members' guests shall not ordinarily exceed 12.

(b) That any Member desirous of introducing a guest shall make written application to the Secretary, giving name, title and address of the intended guest, for an invitation card, without which no guest can be admitted to the dinner. All guests must be of British nationality unless special permission is obtained from the Committee.

(c) The Committee shall have power, without stating its reason, to decline to issue an invitation to any particular person for whom a Member may make application, or may at its discretion and without notice suspend this rule for any particular occasion.

(d) Certain meetings, at the discretion of the Committee, shall not be open to ladies.

OFFICERS.

6. The Officers of the Club shall be:—

- (a) Chairman
- (b) Hon. Treasurer
- (c) Hon. Secretary

COMMITTEE.

7. The Committee shall consist of the honorary officers and of two Members of the Dinner Club. The Committee shall be elected at the Annual Meeting of the Dinner Club and shall meet shortly before each Dinner. The Honorary Secretaries of the Royal Central Asian Society are ex-officio Members of the Committee.

MEETINGS.

8. There shall be six Dinners, viz: in November, December, February, March, April and May.

SUBSCRIPTIONS.

9. (a) The Annual Subscription for Members of the Dinner Club shall be 10/-.

(b) Any Member whose subscription is in arrears for more than one year ceases automatically to be a member of the Dinner Club.

Dinner Club Rules, 1938

'Muslims in Great Britain'. Sir Firoz, High Commissioner for India in London and later to become a Prime Minister of Pakistan, had asked if his secretary might attend the meeting and report his speech. He was told firmly that this was quite against the tradition of the Club: 'If the speakers after him were to feel that someone was present taking notes, it would very much fetter their freedom of expression.'

Matters on the issue of lady members were brought to a head on 25 November 1937 when the assistant secretary, Miss Rachel Wingate, was instructed to write to the five remaining such members of the Club warning them that the speakers at the forthcoming talk on 'The Future Policy of Arab States' (Dr Mohammed Shahbandar, Amir Adil Arslan and Mr George Antonius) had asked that no ladies be present. Miss Wingate pointed out that if the current lady members did wish to attend, the rules could not stop them. The inference, however, was clear.

This was too much for Mrs Dulcie Sassoon and her reaction was by return post:

Dear Madam, I am in receipt of your somewhat ungracious letter . . . I am surprised to learn that women are not supposed to take an interest in such world problems as the future policy of Arab States . . . that point of view seems to me rather early Victorian . . . I was thunderstruck when I heard of the sex barrier . . . However, [as it happens] I had accepted another invitation for that evening, but this does not in the least affect my feelings about the principle of the thing . . . I shall be obliged if you would show this letter to the Officers of the Club.

The officers of the Club may well have caved in temporarily under the onslaught. Certainly the talk on 10 January 1939, by the Earl of Athlone, 'Journey across Saudi Arabia', was attended by some twenty-nine ladies. Maybe the fact that the main guest was HRH Princess Alice, the Countess of Athlone, helped towards this.

The problem of lady members apart, there was a 'crisis meeting' of the committee in January 1932 when membership of the Club had dropped to 90 and attendance fluctuated from a low of mid-20s to an average of 50s to a high in the 70s. (Much as in 2001 in fact.) There was a suggestion that the dinners be alternated with luncheons, though nothing seems to have come of this. The 1930s saw as equally interesting a programme as the decade before. For example, 'American opinion of British policy in India and its repercussions in India'; 'Minorities in Iraq: Air operations against the Kurds'; 'Russia from a Businessman's Point of View'; 'Islam Today' (the Turkish and Egyptian Ambassadors and Mr Yusif Ali) and 'Islam and the War' (1940). During this period there were seven meetings on China and six on Palestine.

The Dinner Club was able to function throughout 1939 and the first half of 1940. In keeping with war-time economy it determined that the cost of meals should not exceed 4/- nor three courses. Draught beer was to be drunk instead of wine, and evening dress, which had previously been required, was optional. But the constant bombing throughout the autumn of 1940 and 1941 made it difficult to continue meetings. However, it was decided 'to carry on the objects for which the Club was established' and a few small luncheons were held. Their object was to allow the diplomatic representatives of Muslim countries to give their views informally about Islam and the War. In this way many useful conversations were held, and contacts established with the British government in a way which would not have been possible officially. This reflected Sir Harold Nicolson's comment about the Society in 1940: 'A marvellous safety valve through which steam can escape without doing any damage at all to the mechanism of State.' Attendance at these lunches was by invitation and no notices were sent out to members.

It was not until 1950 that the idea of resurrecting the Dinner Club was suggested and Colonel Newcombe, still nominally both its Chairman and Honorary Secretary, was approached. The Society's Secretary, Miss Wingate, wrote to Newcombe pointing out that thirty-six members had gone on paying their standing orders throughout the war. They could rightly expect a refund or have their Society subscriptions proportionately adjusted but either way 'in the Society's present financial position this would be rather a shock'. She suggested further that the interests of members had now turned somewhat to the Near East (the area best known to Newcombe, who had worked with T. E. Lawrence) and 'you did pick your Dinner Club pretty carefully before the war and none of them is likely to have turned into a bore in the meantime'.

Newcombe, who had by then retired as Honorary Secretary of the main Society, agreed to write to all past members but handed his Honorary Secretary post of the Club to Air Commodore A. C. Buss who, coincidentally, was also an Arabist. Thirty-nine of the former fifty-eight members still in contact agreed to continue their membership. The question of lady members again arose and Newcombe had to write to the two remaining saying: 'The Club will have to continue to be run in an economical way and, for the time being, as with similar clubs, will have to be for men only.'

The Dinner Club records for the period 1950–1960 are no longer extant but it seems the first resumed meeting was held in May 1950. By the 1960s, with Mr Colin Rees Jenkins as Secretary, the Club was functioning much as before except that there was one main speaker only at each meeting. Many of these were serving, or recently retired, senior diplomats both British and foreign, who could speak on their areas with fresh authority. The Club remained unavowed to the main Society and more than one Chairman was reprimanded by the Honorary Secretaries for letting its existence slip out. This arcanum seems strange given that notices about its meetings appeared occasionally on the Court Page of The Times and the Daily Telegraph. By 1968 membership had climbed to 156 and ladies were admitted as guests. By the mid-1980s, under Mr James Fulton, 21 international companies were admitted as Corporate Members and by 1995 with Lieut Colonel A. P. H. B. Fowle as the new (and current) Honorary Secretary, the permitted membership ceilings had been raised to 200 Ordinary and 70 Corporate Members.

Post-war meetings were held first at the RAF and RAC Clubs or the British Empire Society, but by 1970 had moved to the House of Lords where it was necessary for one of the Society's Peers to be present. They were held originally in the main dining room but after the House took to sitting in the evenings they were moved to the Cholmondeley Room, which remains the present venue. Subjects continued to reflect the current political concerns and a further selection are worth quoting to show this. In the 1960s, for example: 'Vietnam'; 'Interpretation of Recent Events in India' and 'The Naval Situation in S. E. Asia when we withdraw from the Far East'. In the 1970s and 1980s, 'Impressions of Soviet Central Asia'; 'Current Affairs in Japan' (HE Mr Maraichi Fugiyama, the Japanese Ambassador); 'Contemporary China' (Professor Wang Gung Wu); 'The Great Game revisited: Issues in the Sub-continent' and 'Observing Islam Today'. Finally, a selection from 1990–2000. 'Middle East Terrorism'; 'Central Asia: The End of the Cold War'; 'China: What is going on there?' and 'Succeeding Together: Britain and Asia in a Global Market Place'.

Though the de jure ruling which debarred women from full membership of the Club continued throughout the 1960s and 1970s there was a gradual increase in the number of women attending its dinners, both as guests and as members in their own right. In December 1994 the rules were revised to allow membership to be open, by invitation, to all members of the Society, regardless of sex or country of birth. The invitation was dependent on both Ordinary and Corporate Members being proposed and seconded and finally accepted by the committee, thus allowing women to become full members of this previously male enclave. Despite this relaxation it was not until February 1996 that this 'secret society' within the Society proper was given formal publicity to the entire membership.

The Royal Society for Asian Affairs is a charitable society and as such is not allowed to confer any direct personal financial advantage on its members. In order to meet this legal requirement the Dinner Club continues to be independent of the main Society, with a separate subscription and a separate membership. In December 2000 it numbered 130 Ordinary and 31 Corporate Members.

The Dinner Club remains indeed 'A special feature of the Society'. Apart from the recent avowal, little has changed in the pattern of its activities since its inception in 1921, except the costs. But the range of talks on topical political issues, still delivered on 'Chatham House rules', provides a uniquely candid and knowledgeable exposé not always possible in the open forum of the Society's main lectures.

A ROLE IN EDUCATION

This Society has an enormous role and influence, particularly in education . . . it is the ability to spread that knowledge and educate others that is so important.

HRH The Princess Royal, Annual Dinner, 1993

The Founding Fathers of the Society saw one of its principal objectives as being educative. From the outset the rules stated an aim to be 'to advance the study of languages, literature, art, history, religious activities, usages, institutions, customs and manners of Central Asia and adjoining countries'. And 'to promote the study and investigation of questions and matters concerning those countries and to make more accessible to the general public a knowledge of all problems and conditions which affect them'. The Society has done this through the medium of its lectures, articles in its Journal, seminars, study groups and by creating a panel of speakers prepared to give talks to schools and institutions. As early as 1906 the retiring chairman, Sir Edwin Collen, was able to say: 'I believe the influence of this small society is growing, that it fulfils the aims and missions its founders had in view and that by degrees we may be able to break down the stupendous barrier of ignorance about Eastern problems which at present stands in all its solid indifference before us.'

In pursuit of its aim to advance the study of Asian languages and cultures the Society associated itself closely with moves to found a School of Oriental Studies (SOS) which later became the School of Oriental and African Studies (SOAS). This was on the initiative of General Edward Chapman, who had had a long and eventful career in India before his retirement in 1901. In a lecture to the Society in December 1903 on 'Our Commercial Policy in the East', Chapman said: 'I, for one, would hail with delight an announcement that our Council were prepared to initiate steps which may lead to the formation of a National Oriental School of Learning in London . . . the Royal Asiatic Society would, I am certain, be ready to join us in an endeavour to create such a school.' Chapman prefaced these remarks with a quotation from a recent book by the influential Times correspondent, Mr Valentine

General Sir Edward Chapman

Chirol (Chairman of the Society in 1907–1908): 'That with our vast interests in all parts of the East, this country should still be [the] only one amongst the chief countries of Europe that does not possess any national institute for the study of Oriental languages ... is an almost unaccountable fact, which increases the difficulty of finding at a moment's notice suitable men even for the posts which are recognised to be the most urgently needed.' Chapman's idea was by no means new. It had first been voiced by Sir Richard Wellesley in 1798 when he was Governor General of India, and by the start of the twentieth century there were two colleges in London, and others at provincial universities, that did teach Oriental languages. But a need was felt to create one major establishment in London dedicated to this purpose.

In June 1904 the Royal Asiatic Society (RAS) replied favourably to Chapman's suggestion and a joint committee was set up with Sir Alfred Lyall, Colonel H. Picot, Sir Martin Conway, Sir Thomas Holdich, General Chapman and, later, Mr William Irvine, as the Society's representatives. In November of that year Professor T. W. Rhys Davids, Secretary of the RAS, lectured the Society on 'Oriental Studies in England and Abroad'. In November 1905, the Senate of London University agreed to a resolution from its Academic Council that 'A Committee be appointed to consider the re-organisation of Oriental Studies in the University and to suggest a scheme therefor'. In March 1906 Mr Irvine, who had become the Society's most active member on this matter, reported to Council on a recent meeting of that committee which he had attended. It was held under the auspices of the University of London and chaired by Lord Reay, a former Governor of Bombay and then President of both the RAS and the British Academy. The resulting proposal was that a joint deputation should be made to the Prime Minister, Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman, and Council decided to write to all Members of Parliament who were members of the Society, to ask if they would join it. Action at this level was thought appropriate because one purpose of the proposed school was to train officials to undertake the government's imperial responsibilities more ably.

A joint delegation from those institutions interested in the creation of an Oriental Language School was received by the Prime Minister in December 1906. Members of the Society were included either by dint of having common membership with the RAS or, like the Society's Founder and Honorary Treasurer, Dr Cotterell Tupp, as members of the London University Committee in their own right. There is a terse and rather curious two-line entry in the Society's minute book for 4 December 1906: 'The Society received no notice of the Deputation on Oriental Studies which was received by the Prime Minister on December 3rd.' This suggests that the Society was not included under its own name and there is no mention of it being so in the official histories of SOAS<sup>1</sup> and the RAS<sup>2</sup>. While the leading part in subsequent developments was taken by the University of London it is likely that General Chapman's original initiative, and the Society's members on the joint committee, were major factors in turning talk into action.

In 1909 the government gave approval for the creation of such a school as part of London University. Because of the war and the delay in finding premises it was not opened until early 1917. The school's first Director was Sir Denison Ross who joined the Society in 1925, served on its Council and became a Vice President while still in that post. It can thus be seen that the Society had close links with SOS, which became SOAS in 1938, and these continue to this day. The 'Future of Asian Studies in the United Kingdom' was the subject of one of the Society's Special Study Groups in 1981 when, appropriately, it was chaired by Sir Cyril Philips, then recently retired as the Director of SOAS.<sup>3</sup> A representative from the School's academic staff is normally a member of the Society's Council.

The Society could not claim to have had any such similar role in the setting up in 1944 of an Arabic language school, the Middle East Centre for Arab Studies (MECAS), located firstly in Jerusalem and then at Shemlan in the Lebanon. The Centre, administered by the Foreign Office, was open to students from the Diplomatic Service, the British Council, the armed services, oil companies, banks and other commercial bodies.<sup>4</sup> But its concept was in keeping with the ideas of the Society and it is worth noting here that most of those involved in its foundation, in some way or another, and mentioned in the opening chapter of Sir James Craig's history of the school, were at that time members of the Society.<sup>5</sup> Among those were The Hon. Robin Maugham, Brigadier Sir Illtyd Clayton, Sir Kinahan Cornwallis, Sir Harold MacMichael, Brigadier J. B. Glubb, Mr E. A. Chapman-Andrews, Mr Albert Hourani and Miss Freya Stark. Also, importantly, Mr C. A. F. Dundas, who, based in Cairo, had from 1936 to 1942, been the British Council's first independent representative in the Middle and Near East, before being attached to the Foreign Office.<sup>6</sup> Bertram Thomas, who became its first Director, was a long-standing member, joining the Society in 1922. He served on the Council from 1931 to 1936 and then became a Vice President. In January 1945, six months after MECAS was founded, Sir Percy Sykes, one of the two Honorary Secretaries, wrote to Thomas expressing the Society's appreciation for maintaining such close links and for persuading so many of his students to join it. In 2000 some fifty-five members of the MECAS Association, its graduate 'Old Boys' body, were also members of the RSAA.

Robin Maugham's claims to have fostered the original concept of MECAS have, as Sir James Craig notes, to be viewed with some circumspection. In 1944 he tried to set up a counterpart establishment in London. In a long letter to the Society, dated 30 October 1944, he refers to his role in establishing MECAS and says there must be a corresponding Middle East Centre in London. He had discussed these ideas with Colonel Newcombe, Colonel Elphinstone, Major Altounyan, Brigadier Glubb and Mr Beavan of the British Council. The Centre, Maugham stressed, should be in the concept of a Club where officers returning from the Middle East could maintain contact and keep abreast of Arab affairs, young English students of Arab affairs and Arab students coming to London to study could meet and where arrangements could be made for Arabs to be invited to stay in British homes. It could also be a training centre for British Council officials. Maugham ends his letter by suggesting that all the associations in London, which are concerned in any way with Arab affairs, such as the Anglo-Egyptian and Anglo-Iraqi Societies, should house themselves under one roof, though in separate rooms. This conglomerate would become the Middle East Centre he had outlined.

Colonel Newcombe, joint Honorary Secretary, passed Maugham's letter to the Chairman, General Sir John Shea. The General, probably wishing to have little to do with the mercurial Maugham (who was the novelist Somerset Maugham's nephew), minuted somewhat drily: 'I am convinced that if there is any suggestion of forming one single central club that the approach to the other clubs be made by Maugham and not us.' Newcombe subsequently read the letter to Council who decided that the matter 'should be deferred', a favourite formula for getting rid of a troublesome item. Maugham eventually joined the Council in May 1948, resigning a year later 'as I am too much abroad but will re-join when settled in England', which in the event he never did.

However dismissive Council may have been of Maugham's report, when it came to offering evidence to the Scarbrough Committee, set up in early 1945 to study the question of the post-war teaching of Oriental, Slavonic, East European and African languages in Britain, it did draw on some of his suggestions. Three members represented the Society on the committee, Brigadier General Sir Osborne Manse, the Central Asian missionary Miss Mildred Cable and the Treasurer, Major Edward Ainger. The Earl of Scarbrough himself became both the President of the Society and Chairman of SOAS in the following decade. The Society's representatives emphasised that Oriental studies were not just a question of linguistics: 'It does not appear to us that the objects which your committee have in mind can be realised unless intimate sound contact between European and Oriental races can be achieved and existing race and class prejudices broken down. . . In order to provide greater facilities for these contacts between British and Foreign students we recommend that centres should be established in London. . . one for the Middle East, one for the Far East and one for India. . . Of equal importance will be the establishment of centres in each of the foreign countries where British students can freely meet their Oriental opposite numbers.'

In the early stages of the Second World War the Society received a letter from the Education Officer of the War Office asking it to provide lecturers to speak to soldiers and airmen based at establishments in the Home Counties. Soon after its end, the Society became concerned about the need to educate foreign students and for their welfare whilst in this country. It sent a memorandum to the British Council and to some government departments, suggesting that special officers be appointed in each university to look after the welfare of foreign students, and that places be kept open in British universities for Asiatic students, especially in the engineering field, after pre-courses in English. There was also a suggestion that Arabic should be taught at some public schools.

The Society, always with a mind to influence and educate young people, has had an interest in schools. In October 1922 Council proposed that the Society should 'give lectures to Public Schools and Working Men's Clubs'. Colonel C. B. Stokes, formerly of Skinner's Horse, a hero of Dunsterforce in Baku and a Military Attaché in Teheran, was appointed to make the necessary arrangements. The retired Bishop of Madras was asked to serve on the sub-committee formed for that purpose. Nothing much seems to have evolved from this unlikely coupling and a year later the minute book records that the idea had been postponed 'until it is seen whether schools would welcome this approach'. The first Headmaster of a public school to join the Society was Mr John Bell of St Paul's, London, in 1931.

In September 1949 the Chairman, Lieut General Sir Adrian Carton de Wiart, asked all members of Council to send their copies of the Journal, after use, to the Headmasters of their old schools for their libraries; this in the hope that schools would then become Journal subscribers. In the early 1980s there was a renewed attempt to penetrate the school system. Mr W. J. Watts was placed in charge of the education programme. He compiled a panel of some thirty speakers who were prepared to give lectures to schools, groups, businessmen, cultural organisations and colleges of further education. The Headmasters' Conference, selected public and state schools and institutions, the Royal Overseas League and the Royal Commonwealth Society were so informed.

In 1998 a new initiative was made to recruit schools as Affiliate Members and involve them in the Society's activities. It was interested especially in those in the London area. A fresh sub-committee under Mr Robert Binyon was formed and a new panel of speakers drawn up. At the time of writing the following schools have joined: Abingdon, City of London (Boys), Dauntsey's, Eton, Royal Grammar School High Wycombe and Westminster.

In October 1983 Dr Ina Russell replaced Mr Watts as the Society's education officer. In an article in the June 1985 edition of the Journal she outlined the Society's current activities in this field. She pointed out that if, as was often asserted, the twenty-first century would be that of the Third World then it was time that Asia, which included many of the developing countries, should be better understood. To make the idea behind the panel of speakers better known, the Society organised a seminar at SOAS to an invited audience that included participants from Bristol, Nottingham and Cambridge Universities, and Directors of Education and representatives of the multi-ethnic inspectorate of the Inner London Education Authority (ILEA). The theme, 'Britain's Farthest Neighbours', drew attention to the importance of Asia to the United Kingdom. Chaired by Professor Charles Beckingham, the speakers were Sir Michael Wilford, who spoke about the Far East, Mr St John Armitage on Arab countries of the Gulf and Dr Dennis Duncanson on the problems of education in South East Asia. Mr Peter Sandersley, of the Overseas Development Agency (ODA), an Affiliate Member of the Society, spoke on administering UK aid to the area.

A follow-up seminar was convened on 20 March 1986 at Millbank School in London, under the joint auspices of the Society, SOAS and the ILEA, the latter providing Mr Alyn Davies as Chairman. The three Society speakers stressed the importance of Asia in the modern world and the necessity for providing Asian studies as part of the curriculum at all stages of education in Britain. They explained ways in which RSAA resources could be utilised for this. Sir James Craig spoke on the importance of the Middle East, not only for British interests, but for the linguistic, religious and cultural achievements of its people. Sir Michael Wilford, in summarising the problems in the Far East, made the telling point that 'These are subjects which must be of interest because it is the youth who are going to have to live through them; we will all be dead!’ Professor Charles Beckingham concluded his talk about the educational programme of the RSAA: ‘I think that this ignorance about Asia, which so much worried the founders of our Society, is still a very serious factor.’ A thirty-one page report on the proceedings entitled The Challenge of Asia was issued jointly by the Society and the ILEA.

The Society’s educative role is still mainly exercised through the medium of its lectures and the articles carried in its Journal, with occasional study groups and seminars. It has found it more difficult to penetrate the education system as such, not through any lack of interest but because schools in particular are tightly bound up in their own activities, and they fail, perhaps, to comprehend fully the assets the Society can offer, which are thus under-exploited. Not only does it have its own panel of speakers, but it can find others outside the Society. Recently a London school wanted a speaker on the Middle East Peace Process. The Society was able to offer a Member of Council, a retired Ambassador, much of whose career had been spent dealing with the Arab–Israel conflict.<sup>7</sup>

It may be argued that information about Asia is available today from many sources, not least the Internet. But nothing can replace direct human contact between those who have had long experience of Asia and those who are keen to learn and question. The RSAA has a very considerable store of knowledge which it is keen to share with others. As Lord Jenkins, the Society’s guest at its Annual Dinner in 1990 said: ‘In modern jargon the Society has become a resource centre and anyone who seeks to learn about those parts of our globe can come to the Society and never go away empty handed.’

THE TOURS

by Marinel FitzSimons, MBE

When you have heard you must see and when you have seen you must judge then with your heart.

HE Phagna Inpeng Suryadha, Ambassador of Laos, quoting a Lao proverb to define the work of the Society, Annual Dinner, 1973

The year 1971 was the Society's seventieth anniversary, and to mark the occasion the Earl of Selkirk, then President, suggested a tour. This, enjoyable in itself, might also make the Society better known and attract new members. A two-weeks visit to Southern Anatolia was arranged, and in May of that year 36 members flew to Istanbul and on to Izmir, driving from there to Antalya and east along that beautiful coast to Ankara. On the group's return there were requests for another tour. No one at that time foresaw that they would become an almost annual event.

There have now been 28 tours, and 31 different countries visited, some more than once. The largest group was 40 members, the smallest 10. The original aim has been well achieved; over 600 members have travelled with the Society, some coming from Hong Kong, Australia, New Zealand, the USA and South America, as well as from Europe. New members have been recruited, lasting friendships made and, more importantly, the Society has been brought together as a family.

The choice of country was decided by Council, and there was always someone with knowledge of a given area, either there or among the membership, to advise on an itinerary. Only when every detail had been investigated would travel agents be asked for quotations. Thus costs were kept low, the tour tailor-made and time allowed for overseas members to apply. The itinerary for that first tour was planned by Mr Wilfred Seager, and its organisation was overseen by Air Chief Marshal Sir John Whitworth Jones, who went to great trouble over this and the following venture.

Although outside guest lecturers were invited on occasions, the excellent guides provided and the knowledge available within the group was usually sufficient. Ambassadors and British High Commissioners in the countries visited were frequently members of the Society and laid on receptions. Curators of museums, academics, local archaeologists and similar experts were always ready to meet us and give talks; British Council representatives were particularly helpful.

Accommodation varied enormously, and when the preliminary details of a tour were circulated a note was invariably included to the effect that 'those putting their creature comforts above the general interest should not apply'!

THE ACTIVITIES

The age in the groups ranged from the early twenties to the mid-eighties, and there would be a mixture of interests: some were academics, some botanists or ornithologists, whilst others joined for nostalgic reasons or just had 'itchy feet'. They were happy groups. Our current President, Lord Denman, and our Chairman, Sir Donald Hawley, together with Lady Hawley, came on several occasions.

The early tours averaged two weeks: this was mandatory in China, whilst Burma permitted only one. But as distances increased three weeks became the norm. And although rest days were allowed for, they were not generally appreciated. Enthusiastic members would clamour for an extra excursion, saying they could rest when they got home.

Space allows for only glimpses into a few selected tours but these personal reminiscences should provide the reader with some idea of the pleasures, vicissitudes and excitements experienced.

Afghanistan 1972

The group visiting Afghanistan in 1972 was large so we divided into parties of twenty, each covering the same route reversely and using the Kabul Hotel as a base. Sir Gordon Whitteridge, a former ambassador to Afghanistan, led one group and Dr André Singer, a young anthropologist with experience of the country, the other. Mr Peers Carter, Ambassador at the time, enjoyed showing us over Curzon's embassy with its legendary garden and library. Word spread among young English volunteers who were working in and around Kabul that there was a strange English group in the Hotel. One by one they dropped in to investigate – and four became Junior Members.<sup>1</sup> Food throughout the tour, consisting of the traditional local dishes, was plentiful. However, one older member, dubious about culinary matters in Afghanistan, had taken forty hard-boiled eggs with her!

In Bamiyan our yurts, each holding two people, were pitched on a high plateau looking across to the two Buddhas set into the cliff on the far side of the valley. We climbed up inside the main Buddha, where frescoes were being restored by an Indian team, to be rewarded by a stupendous view of the valley with the snow-capped mountains of the Hindu Kush in the background.<sup>2</sup>

In Mazar-i-Sharif, reached after a kebab lunch eaten sitting on carpets in the bazaar at Tashkurgan, we were taken to see the shrine of Hazrat Ali, the Prophet's cousin and son-in-law. The sun was setting and our female members, by now well-versed, kept well to the perimeter. The road back to Kabul led us over the Salang Pass and through the Salang Tunnel. Little did we foresee its use some years later.

Memories of Afghanistan are happy for us: the peace and quiet of Babur's tomb and gardens, the wonderful displays in the Kabul museum, the drive over the Khyber Pass to Peshawar, the kindness and dignity of the people, the colourful clothes worn, especially in Mazar where men in splendid striped chapans galloped around on magnificent horses. In addition to the rugs, the blue pottery from Istalif and glass from Herat, brought back by many members, a small cutting from an oleander in Jalalabad flourished and blossomed for years on a Chelsea balcony.

China

We visited China three times, in 1974, 1975 and 1979. In February 1974 we were the first unofficial group to be allowed into the country. We owed this to our member Sir John Keswick, a former long-time resident in that country for whom the Chinese obviously had great affection. Together with Lady Keswick, he accompanied us on our first tour and Joe Ford, who started his career with the China Consular Service, came on the following two. We understood later that our visit was to give the Chinese the opportunity to decide whether more commercial groups might safely be allowed to enter. We must have behaved fairly well! It was an interesting time, still in Mao's day and in the midst of the Lin Piao–Confucius problem and a minor revolution.

From the Hong Kong border at Shumchun we had to carry our luggage across the bridge – there were no luxury trains then. On the Chinese side we were greeted by loudspeakers blaring out 'The East is Red'. We were ushered into a waiting room and given copies of The Thoughts of Mao, which one member thought was a copy of the New Testament until he looked inside. From the border to Guangzhou the countryside was lovely. There were no industrial cities then – just paddy fields, terrace cultivation and regiments of orderly ducks, a picture completed by the Hakka men and women in enormous lampshade hats.

The weather was cold but not bitterly so, and we had the Great Wall practically to ourselves, as we did the Ming Tombs. We saw these places again in the sunshine of September 1975, still deserted. But on our next visit, on a wet day in June 1979, there were hordes of other foreign tourists and this made some feel that our first visit, with its distinct touch of fear, had been more adventurous and more fun.

From Beijing, in 1974, we visited Changsha, en route for Mao's birthplace at Shao Shan. Unexpectedly our plane descended at a small airport in the middle of nowhere. We were given lunch and remained there for several hours. Only later did we learn that there had been riots and shooting in Changsha; we had arrived in the midst of a mini Cultural Revolution.

In Hanchow in 1975 our botanists in particular were in their seventh heaven. At the end of the tour they tactfully suggested it might be useful if the flowers at the Botanical Gardens were labelled with their Latin names and we believe this practice was subsequently adopted. In Sian in 1979 we were taken to a performance of Swan Lake. We asked if we might send the ballerina some flowers, a suggestion not well received. However, the next morning a bouquet was produced for us. It consisted of two artificial chrysanthemums and two artificial arum lilies!

The climax of our sojourn in Sian was a visit to the pit where the pottery figures and horses of the Emperor Ch'in Shih Huang Ti's army were being excavated. Looking down into what appeared to be a large construction site, we saw rows and rows of warriors and horses, some complete and some still being unearthed. These were images being uncovered after two thousand years, but the faces were so human and individual they seemed to be gazing up at us with the same wonder as we were down at them.

Flying to Lanchow and the Yellow River, the next one thousand miles to Urumchi were by rail with a two-night stop in Dunhuang, reached by alighting from the train at a halt in the middle of the desert. In Dunhuang, associated with the Society's eminent member, the late Sir Aurel Stein, we visited many of the Cave Temples in the small oasis, and stayed in an old Chinese inn.

Sunday was the day the local population went to the Kazakh horse races in the Tien Shan, the highlight of which was a form of Buzkasi, held in a huge valley surrounded by steep slopes. At the end of the game the competitors lined up to salute the spectators, some of whom accepted an invitation to try out the horses and were led sedately around. Suddenly our own Colonel George Bradbury rose up from his seat, tore down the hillside and mounted a horse. The Kazakhs soon saw that he and his mount were one and gave him his head. He galloped around the course imitating everything that had gone before, to the cheers of the spectators. We were all bursting with pride after we realised he was not going to break his neck. He said afterwards that he had not been on a horse since his polo days forty years before.

Iraq 1978

Although free to carry out our planned itinerary, we were certainly aware of a 'police state' atmosphere. Professor H. W. F. Saggs, from the Department of Semetic Languages, Cardiff University, was with us as Guest Lecturer. We flew to Basra and then continued by road to Al Qurna (alleged site of the Garden of Eden) and on to Al Kabaish on the Euphrates. Here we drifted along narrow waterways banked with reeds eight feet high, passing floating reed houses, waving children and half-submerged water buffaloes. We basked unashamedly in the glory of Wilfred Thesiger's name as a member of the Society. Everyone we met was delighted to have news of him.

We had hoped to visit the Rowanduz Gorge but, told the road was closed, were taken instead to the Dokan Dam built by Binnie and Partners. Geoffrey Binnie, a member of the Society, was unable to be with us but his wife, Elspeth, was. We were allowed to swim in the dam but photography was strictly forbidden, which prompted Elspeth to remark quietly 'they little know we have all the plans at home in a drawer'.

Outside Sulamania in Kurdistan, where a nightly curfew from 6 p.m. was in force, we had an unexpectedly pleasing encounter with the military. Taken into the mountains one afternoon, we had started back in good time and passed the 4 p.m. checkpoint when our bus broke down. It was soon obvious that despite our driver's efforts at repair we should not reach Sulamania by the 6 p.m. curfew, and our guide went off to seek advice from officialdom, leaving us locked up in the bus. We soon released ourselves. Luckily we were halted beside a chaikhana, which was soon denuded of Pepsi, orange, lemon fizz and the like. Professor Saggs agreed to give a talk on Babylon, which we were to visit subsequently. When darkness had fallen, our guide returned to find, to his astonishment, his charges perched on stools and upturned petrol cans, listening in fascination to the Professor. To our surprise jeeps then suddenly arrived and we set off with a military escort, guns at the ready, to spend the night on a high plateau in bungalows built for Turkish workers, as yet unoccupied.

North West Frontier 1981 and Chitral 1995

Twenty-nine members flew to Rawalpindi, where the Pakistan Embassy in London had arranged for two liaison officers to meet and escort us throughout the tour. They were good humoured, knowledgeable and a tremendous help.

Over the years we have been much impressed by the affection in which the British army is still held in India and Pakistan. And on this North West Frontier tour, wherever we went – in the bazaars or in the countryside or simply pausing at a wayside fruit or vegetable stall – there was usually someone whose brother, father or uncle had served in the British army, and who wanted to talk to us.

This memorable tour was planned with the help of Dr André Singer. We camped in the Kaghan valley beside the river from where we were able in the evening to watch the sheep, goats and cattle wending a zig-zag course down to the river to drink, bells ringing. A lovely sight and sound. Subsequently we made an alarming drive in jeeps to the 10,500 ft Lake Saif-ul-Muluk.

The flight to Gilgit from Rawalpindi was tense. After a delay caused by bad weather, the plane was about level with Nanga Parbat mountain when the pilot announced he was turning back due to cloud. 'No, no,' shouted our Colonel Tony Fowle, 'Go on.' The pilot was so startled he did go on! But as we neared our destination he announced dramatically, 'We are now approaching Gilgit, Inshallah. Goodbye.' One of our group had arranged a rendezvous with his old bearer who lived in the hills above Gilgit. As our plane touched down on the runway a little figure could be seen running across the field. It was the bearer, come to greet his old friend with enormous affection.

We visited the Mir's Palace in the Hunza valley, where we were confronted by photographs of Kings George V and VI and Lord Curzon, and the Raja of Punial at Shir Qila. The Raja was a regular listener to the BBC World News in Urdu and begged us to ensure the broadcasts continued.

This tour included a drive through the Khyber Pass to the Afghan border at Torkham. Two days were then spent in Swat, where the Wali entertained us to tea in his beautiful garden. He spoke warmly of his old friend Sir Olaf Caroe, one of many tributes to him during our visit. In Rawalpindi we were invited to a reception given by General Sawar Khan and his wife at the Artillery Officers' Mess. There were five generals present, all former pupils of Colonel Fowle.

There was a return to the area in 1995 to commemorate the centenary of the Siege of Chitral when we followed the route taken by the relieving forces led by Colonel Kelly and General Low.

It was in Gilgit that Kelly's epic march started and here we embarked in eighteen jeeps, two of which carried our cooks and tents. As we reached the Shandur Pass at over 12,000 ft we were able to appreciate the determination and courage of his men. Arriving at Mastuj Fort, which first had to be relieved by Kelly, we were welcomed by Colonel Khushwaqt-ul-Mulk, a son of Shuja-ul-Mulk, the twelve-year-old who had been installed as Mehtar.

Continuing to Chitral the various battles fought by Kelly's men along the route were studied. On arrival there we were welcomed by the Mehtar's uncle, Prince Asad-ur-Rahman, who introduced us to Fateh Ali Shah, whose grandfather and great grandfather had both been in the Fort at the time of the Siege. It was exactly one hundred years and six months since Robertson and his comrades had sat down to dinner in the Fort with Kelly and his officers. Hung inside were the horns of a Marco Polo sheep, the Society's emblem, under which our President was photographed.

Raja Jan Alam of Punial

The remainder of the tour followed in reverse direction the route taken by General Low's relief force, which had started at Nowshera. After a visit to Peshawar, a farewell dinner was held in Islamabad, when Colonel Khushwaqt-ul-Mulk presented a bronze markhor to our President and spoke feelingly of the peace and stability in Chitral that had followed the events of 1895.

Kashmir and Ladakh 1986

We visited Ladakh in 1986, after a week in Kashmir. There had been rumblings of trouble, and on our return to Srinagar from Ladakh to catch the plane to Delhi we were given an armed escort to the airport.

In Kashmir we enjoyed gliding gently in shikaras on the Dal and Nagin lakes, exploring the beauties of the Mogul and Shalimar Gardens, and visiting the old Residency where Sir Francis Younghusband ended his career in India. We acclimatised ourselves in Gulmarg at 8,000 ft, where two members located the old English church, unused for forty years but housing an old Christmas tree with decorations still intact.

We drove the 270 dramatic miles to Leh and after a night's stop at Kargil climbed over the Fatu-La Pass before curvetting down to the Indus valley. We reached our serai at Stok and slept peacefully in purpose-built yurts in a field surrounded by willow trees. We made visits to the gompas at Skey, Tiksi, Hemis and Atko, followed by an excursion down the Indus in inflatable rubber rafts.

During the tour a much-loved member, Major General Sir Maurice Dowse, was taken ill and moved to the hospital in Leh. This tragedy is being retold as it demonstrates again the close feeling between the two armies. The manager of the serai had asked the Divisional Commander if General Dowse could be moved to a military hospital. He immediately gave permission and personally supervised the move. Later, the Corps Commander, visiting Leh, called to see the General, who seemed to be rallying, and told him that when he was fit enough to travel arrangements would be made for a military aircraft to fly him to Chandigar with an orderly and all necessary equipment. The General asked about the cost: the answer was 'Nothing, we wear the same uniform'. Unfortunately he did not gain strength and died three days later. We learnt subsequently that the Indian army had given General Dowse a military funeral with full honours.

Kashgar 1990

The tour up the Karakoram Highway and over the Khunjerab Pass to Kashgar was a Mecca for the Society.

After a memorable journey from Islamabad to Gilgit, a detour to Hunza and a night at Gulmit, we embarked in Toyota Landcruisers for the drive to the border with China, marked at 15,072 ft by an obelisk. Our Uigher guide awaited us at Pir Ali, the Chinese immigration post, and took us to Tashkurgan. The next morning's drive provided splendid views of Mustagh Ata and Mt Kungur, and a herd of yaks obligingly arrived to greet us as we approached Lake Karakul. Our hotel, on arrival in Kashgar, had once been the Russian Consulate from where Nikolai Petrovsky had played the 'Great Game' with George Macartney.

A highlight of our stay there was the visit to the Sunday market, said to be attended by 100,000 people each week and where everything imaginable was sold – horses, camels, other livestock, clothing, furniture, timber, meat and vegetables. If you heard the cry 'Posh Posh' you jumped aside to avoid being mown down by galloping mule carts.

A memorable banquet was given for us in Chini Bagh, the home of Sir George and Lady Macartney and other British Consuls General for so long at the centre of that 'Great Game'. The house was in a sad state of decay, its rooms divided into dormitories and used as night stops for long distance lorry drivers, who had been turned out and the place cleaned up for our benefit. The room in which we ate gave on to a terrace overlooking the one-time garden created by Lady Macartney but now a heap of rubble preparatory to the building of a new modern hotel. The evening began with drinks on the terrace, and Hugh Leach, our bugler, sounded 'Officers Dress for Dinner'.

Next morning we made an early start for the long drive to Khotan where we spent three days of enjoyable activity, successfully searching for jade in the Jade River, sliding down the high sand dunes of the Taklamakan and watching the whole process of silk weaving. From here we travelled by air to Urumchi, before setting off by road for Turfan. Sightseeing included a visit to the cave paintings at Bezaklik and the workings of a qanat.

Siberia 1991

The Siberian tour started a week after Yeltsin's coup and on our arrival Moscow was in a state of euphoria. It was an interesting time to be there. We had with us our own Russian expert John Massey-Stewart.

Our guide was a sturdy young Russian with a pigtail reaching down to her waist, who showed us round the Kremlin. We were invited by Sir Roderick and Lady Braithwaite for drinks at the British Embassy and given the opportunity to see that imposing building as well as hearing the Ambassador's comments on the current situation. From Moscow we went by air to Tyumen for a night in Tobolsk. We heard the sound of singing coming from the church which we found packed and were given a warm welcome.

From Novosibirsk, our next stop, we flew to Gorno-Altai in a small aircraft that we practically filled, loading our luggage into it ourselves, filling the hold and then piling cases at the back of the plane and along the gangway. Arriving at the town, we had a long wait at the so-called hotel before being allowed to occupy the third floor where we found the sheets still damp. Who, we wondered darkly, had been evacuated for our accommodation? The consensus of opinion was that the hotel doubled as a brothel!

Another less than comfortable experience was an expedition to Lake Teletskoe, some 200 kilometres away in the mountains over terrible roads. This took six hours, but we managed to procure an ancient helicopter from Aeroflot for the return journey, at a cost of £1.13 per head.

Our next destination, Irkutsk, was preceded by another six-hour bus journey, to Novosibirsk, from where we were to catch a plane. Owing to the general economic situation there was very little fuel available and our bus had to stop at every likely petrol station en route, obtaining twenty litres here and there with the help of packets of Marlboro cigarettes. The flight itself took two hours and we arrived in pouring rain, cold, tired and hungry, to find no transport to take us into Irkutsk itself. However, more cigarettes produced a dilapidated coach in which we sat with umbrellas up, for the roof leaked copiously.

Next day we visited the Cathedral of the Holy Cross, which was packed with old and young, the House of the Decembrists, now a museum, and the Angara icebreaker, built on the Tyne in 1897 by Armstrong Whitworth and Co. and in use as a ferry until 1960, now also a museum. The sun shone for us in the afternoon and we appreciated the beauty of the city, well deserving its title 'the Paris of Siberia'.

Two days were spent beside Lake Baikal, the first in sunshine, the lake looking beautiful. The second day was cold, wet and windy. Nevertheless we embarked as planned on a full-day boat trip. The hotel staff, horrified, offered to lend us thick sweaters. We landed on an island to visit a research museum and enjoy a picnic lunch. It was bitterly cold but having built a huge bonfire, we toasted our slabs of bread and cheese over the flames, while the vodka flowed freely. On the return journey, a member was nearly decapitated as one of the lifeboats broke loose and flew across the deck, landing with a splash in the lake, sinking immediately.

'... we toasted our slabs of bread and cheese ...'

From Irkutsk we travelled by night train to Ulan-Ude, capital of Buryatia, and from there by road to the border with Mongolia, making a detour to Novo-Selenginsk near the Selanga River where there is a memorial to four British missionaries who lived there in 1819.<sup>3</sup> Our bugler sounded the Last Post as we paid our respects, to the utter astonishment of villagers and hordes of children. We left Siberia at Naushki by night sleeper on the Trans-Mongolian Railway for two days in Mongolia, a journey enlivened by conversations with young Russian soldiers who had served in Afghanistan.

Uzbekistan 1994

The renowned sites in Samarkand and Bokhara were a wonderful reward for the effort of getting there, and complemented by a visit to the Fergana Valley. Two nights had been allotted to Urgench to allow for a day in Khiva, normally only visited for its architecture and termed a 'dead city' because of its dearth of inhabitants. But it turned out to be 'Veterans' Day', a public holiday, and Khiva was teeming with people wearing their most colourful clothes, the men proudly displaying their medals. Even weddings were taking place, the brides wearing long white dresses.

On the way back to Urgench a detour was made to the Oxus, where we walked across a pontoon bridge some 800 metres long to Burini, accompanied by friendly locals on their way home. We walked slowly back, enthralled with the changing lights on the water. Our pretty local guide, Svetlana, began to recite from Matthew Arnold's poem 'Sohrab and Rustam'; apparently they had all read at school the epic legend of how Rustam unwittingly kills his only son, Sohrab. But emotion proved too much and she dissolved into tears, so we had to finish the story for her.

These are but a few reminiscences from the many varied tours the Society made across Asia, listed in the Annex. There has been no space to enlarge upon our adventures. For example, how, when near Sharura in Yemen, travelling in trucks owned by wild-looking tribesmen, our party was ambushed by another tribe who had lost out on the battle for our trade; the delights, and physical challenge, of a tented trek across mountainous Bhutan; Korea where there were so few foreign visitors we were considered novelties, and our clothes were fingered by the crowds that surrounded us; or the pathos in Burma when, visiting Kalow, a favourite British Hill Station, we found a large Catholic church run by an Italian priest who had been there for forty years. He was delighted to see us. His congregation was down to two.

Most countries invoked individual nostalgia. In Sri Lanka two members, brothers, who had spent their childhood there were able to find their old home. And Cynthia Stephenson, who had worked in the country during the Second World War, was thrilled to find Lord Mountbatten's old Headquarters. Members unwittingly provided amusement. In Bangalore someone decided to miss the morning tour and write twenty postcards. Despite our having seen a green pillar box boldly marked VR just outside the hotel, she duly posted them in a long slit surrounded by shining brass in the polished mahogany at the Reception Desk. She had failed to read the notice 'Staff Christmas Gratuities'. It was only February. Members' birthdays were celebrated in the most unlikely places. None more so, perhaps, than on the train between Lanchow and Liuyuang in China, when the cook produced a magnificent meal topped by a birthday cake, all over an open fire in the tiny travelling galley. So many memories to savour.

THE ACTIVITIES

China Tour, 1974

Nepal, 1980

Group at Karo La (17,000 ft), Centenary Tour, Tibet 2001 [Lady Fenn]

Miss Marinel FitzSimons led the Society's tours from 1971 to 1995; Mrs Helen McKeag in 1997 and Mr David Easton from 1998 to 2001. The following is his account of the centenary tour.

Tibet

To mark the Society's centenary in 2001 Council sought to combine two complementary objectives in choosing the tour destination. Tibet, in itself a first for the Society, was chosen and the theme of the journey would be to retrace, as far as possible, the route of Younghusband's mission to Lhasa in 1904. So it was that in late September 2001 a party of twenty-seven gathered in Calcutta, where a day's stopover had to suffice to view the faded splendour of the former seat of British rule in India, whence Younghusband's patron, Curzon, exercised power as Viceroy between 1899 and 1905. In Darjeeling, as well as enjoying a brief period of rest and acclimatisation in the comfort of the delightful Windamere Hotel, the group was able to imagine the scene of preparation for Younghusband's departure for Tibet in December 1903. The well-maintained Planter's Club remains as a monument to that era, as do a number of unkempt hotels!

Since Younghusband's route from India into Tibet via Sikkim had long been denied to travellers, it was intended that the tour party should enter the Tibetan Autonomous Region (TAR) of China across the land border from Nepal. However, the Chinese authorities closed this without notice just as the group was about to leave India for Nepal, necessitating a rapid adjustment of the itinerary. The only option was to take the direct Chinese airline flight from Kathmandu to Lhasa. This meant forgoing the rough but picturesque road journey between the Nepalese capital and Shigatse, via Shegar. A small consolation was sighting the summit of Everest clearly visible as the flight passed it. A secondary benefit was that the party gained two extra days in Tibet, allowing time for a side-trip to the sacred lake Nam Tso, some 120 miles north of Lhasa and at an altitude of 4,718 metres in an idyllic setting.

However, the main itinerary took the party from Lhasa to Shigatse, and then on to Gyantse and Tsetang. The sights in these four major centres and the beauty of the scenery in between were enchanting. In the context of Younghusband's expedition the most memorable sites were the fort at Gyantse and the Karo La Pass, where two of the main actions on the road to Lhasa took place. Seeing the terrain, and particularly the commanding position of the Gyantse dzong high on a steep rocky outcrop, it was not difficult to conjure up a picture of the fighting in both places, especially with the assistance of the accounts in Patrick French's biography of Younghusband.<sup>4</sup> While in Gyantse the group held an enjoyable discussion about the British invasion of 1904, attempting to analyse it in the context of its time.

Leaving Tibet, the final destination was Beijing, from where power over the destiny of Tibet has been exercised by the Chinese since 1950. That sobering thought did not detract from the group's appreciation of its great sites and bustling modernity.

THE LAWRENCE OF ARABIA MEMORIAL MEDAL

The Lawrence of Arabia medal is just one indication of the strong place that Lawrence holds in the hearts of those who are interested in Central Asia.

General Sir Richard Gale, Chairman, welcoming
Professor Arnold Lawrence to the Annual Dinner, 1962

The idea that the Society should have a Gold Medal was first discussed at a Council meeting in October 1923. This followed a suggestion by the retiring Honorary Secretary, Lieut Colonel A. C. Yate, that it be awarded to the person who each year has given the greatest service to the British Empire in the countries covered by the Society. But, as was so often the case with novel conceptions, it was decided to postpone the issue for the present. It was not raised again until immediately after the death of T. E. Lawrence on 19 May 1935. The suggestion of a medal in his memory was made not so much by, but to the President, Field Marshal Viscount Allenby, Lawrence's war-time commander. He responded with enthusiasm and Lawrence's brother, the archaeologist Professor Arnold Lawrence, gave his support.

At the end of May a short article appeared in The Times together with a letter signed by three of Lawrence's war-time colleagues, Lord Lloyd, Sir Ronald Storrs and Colonel Stewart Newcombe. The letter asked the public for donations to reach a target of £500 'in order to institute a Gold Medal in his memory . . . Lawrence was a writer and a seeker as well as hero, and it is fitting that his memorial should encourage like, if lesser, achievement in an increasingly standardized and safety-first age.' A notice in the Society's Journal called upon members to contribute, pointing out that 'by instituting a Gold Medal in memory of Lawrence, members of the Society are given the means of showing their appreciation of contributions to the study and solution of the problems of Asia made by men who are working in the East'.

LAWRENCE OF ARABIA

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TIMES

Sir,—It has been decided by the Council of the Royal Central Asian Society that a gold medal shall be instituted by the society in memory of T. E. Lawrence, to be awarded from time to time for work of outstanding distinction in travel, research, or letters in the Near and Middle East.

The sum required is comparatively trifling : to wit, £500, the interest on which will provide the necessary sum. Subscriptions will be received by the secretary of the society.

Lawrence was a writer and a seeker as well as a hero, and it is fitting that his memorial should encourage like if lesser achievement in an increasingly standardized and safety-first age.

Yours, &c.,

LLOYD.
RONALD STORRS.
STEWART NEWCOMBE

May 28.

The Society's previous connections with T. E. Lawrence and his world were binding. Of the names mentioned in Seven Pillars of Wisdom twenty-three were members. A few knew him before the First World War and the Arab Revolt, a good many more during it. Hogarth and Storrs launched him in his role; Parker, Garland, Bray and Vickery were early contacts in the field; and Joyce, Peake, Stirling, Winterton, Lloyd, Newcombe and Jaafar Pasha served through most of the fighting. Allenby, Clayton, Deedes, Cornwallis and Gertrude Bell were at base in Cairo or elsewhere; Barrow appears briefly and brusquely in Dera'a; Wingate in Khartoum; Churchill and Field Marshal Robertson in London. A few had joined the Society before the war, the great majority soon after it when others like Charlotte Shaw and Philby became his friends. Shortly after Lawrence's death his brothers Arnold and Montagu, and his mother Sarah, joined. All these members' connections with T. E. Lawrence and the part they played in the Arab Revolt, the campaigns in the Hejaz and Palestine and his post-war life, are too well known to bear repetition here.

A study of the Journal indexes reveals the wealth of material available in transcribed lectures, articles, obituaries, letters and book reviews. They were written by individuals who were involved in those historical events and who knew their subject. They reflect the diversity of views held so soon after the end of the war, views which may have become distorted by, or lost to, history and are thus of especial value to researchers.

There is no record as to Lawrence's own awareness of the Society. Certainly nothing supports Elizabeth Monroe's assertion in her book on Philby that Lawrence 'put in an appearance' at the Society's Annual Dinner on 11 July 1934 at which, she maintained, the Emir Abdullah of Trans-Jordan and Dora, Philby's wife, were present.<sup>1</sup> It is true that Abdullah was invited, but he left England four days before the dinner. In any case the Society's white-tie dinners were not the sort of event where one 'put in an appearance', least of all that Lawrence would do so. He was, at this time, at RAF Bridlington working on his air-sea-rescue speedboats.

Of those so associated with Lawrence some became the Society's Presidents: Allenby, Lloyd and Shea; some Chairmen: Holdich and Chetwode; and Newcombe, as previously mentioned, a leading Honorary Secretary. Yet others became members of Council. Thus it was not surprising that members, and indeed some non-members, readily contributed to the medal fund and when it closed in 1938 it had reached around £230. This included a donation of £110 contributed by all ranks of the Royal Air Force in recognition of Lawrence's service in its ranks.

The money was needed as capital to engage the services of a designer for the medal, for it to be cast by the Royal Mint and to provide sufficient interest to purchase copies from the Mint as they were required. The obvious choice of designer was the artist Eric Kennington, who was then in the process of carving the effigy of Lawrence that was later placed in St Martin's Church, Wareham, and whose portraits of leading characters who took part in the Arab Revolt later appeared in various editions of Seven Pillars of Wisdom. Kennington agreed to the commission 'on a minimum fee of £30 and a maximum of £50 if funds allowed' – which they did. He estimated that making the matrix would cost £40–£50: each silver medal £2 and a gold one £10. The front of the medal would bear Lawrence's image with the inscription 'Lawrence of Arabia', the verso a representation of the Society's crest – the horns of the Ovis Poli – and the Society's motto. When eventually cast it was described by Sir George Hall of the British Museum as a 'master medal'.

A sub-committee was needed to deal with these matters. Its initial members were those signatories of The Times letter, Lloyd, Storrs and Newcombe. There were early discussions

Dear Sir Percy Sykes
I have heard from the Musst model of the size agreed with cost.
— for 2 dies — between £ 40 & £ 50.

To strike one silver model annually with a good case to contain it, & the same of the receipt round the run will cost about 25/—

For £ 30, I will design & model the model, & when it is approved by you will see to the making of the dies.

If, as suggested, the £ 30 becomes £ 50
I, shall be pleased to accept the larger amount.

Yours sincerely

as to whether it should in fact be a gold medal 'similar to that of the United Service Institute of India's MacGregor Medal, to mark special occasions and be awarded every three years, or a silver one to be awarded every year'.<sup>2</sup> The committee decided on the latter as it was soon clear that the hoped-for target of £500 would not be met.

The terms of the award were next formulated:

In recognition of work, normally including hazard, of outstanding merit for the British Empire and of distinction in exploration, research or letters. Such service must have been rendered by members of the British Empire within the area covered by the activities of the Royal Central Asian Society. It is not intended to limit the objects for which the medal will be awarded, but Naval, Military and Air Force officers, explorers, writers, administrators, pioneers of trade routes, archaeologists and anthropologists may be specially mentioned; and the award will, generally speaking, be made to individuals who are in the field or who have only recently retired from it.

The reference to the British Empire was later omitted. An adjunct to the terms read:

The medal is not awarded as an additional recognition of work done in the ordinary course of official or civilian employment, but for some unusual contribution, especially where this leads to a better understanding and friendship between British and an Eastern people, or when a primitive people have been helped to a better way of life.

The medal itself secured and the terms agreed upon, the sub-committee was enlarged to form a panel that would recommend to Council candidates they considered should receive it. This consisted of the Chairman, the Honorary Secretaries, the Treasurer, and three members of Council selected annually. In addition there were four permanent members who as late as 1950 were still Arnold Lawrence, Storrs and Newcombe – and Eric Kennington, the designer of the medal. He, however, was a somewhat reluctant member, writing later to the Secretary: 'I would prefer to not vote, please. I am so ignorant of these people's achievements and the East.'

The first recipient in 1936 was Major J. B. Glubb (later Glubb Pasha) – 'For valuable services rendered while serving in command of the Levies in Iraq and the Desert Patrols of Trans-Jordan for some sixteen years. Through his remarkable influence over the Bedouin Arab he ended a state of disorder that had prevailed in the Trans-Jordanian deserts and paved the way to better relations between the rulers of those countries and King Ibn Saud.'

Glubb Pasha

The next recipient, in 1937, was the distinguished Tibetologist Sir Charles Bell who – 'has acquired greater knowledge of the Tibetan language, literature, manners and customs than any other Englishman. His friendship with the Thirteenth Dalai Lama was an outstanding event in British relations with Tibet. His valuable books cover every aspect of Tibetan life.'

Three more Arabists followed. In 1938 the medal was awarded to Major C. S. Jarvis, who had served in three desert areas, Libya, the western desert of Egypt and as a Governor of Sinai. In 1939 it was awarded jointly to Mr and Mrs W. H. Ingrams. As Political Resident in the Hadhramaut, the mid-southern part of Arabia, Harold Ingrams had, for the first time, pacified the tribes and his tenure of office was known as Sulh Ingram, 'Ingrams's peace'. Influencing the award was a long confidential letter, written in the small neat hand of the archaeologist Gertrude Caton-Thompson: 'It would be difficult to separate them, or to say which is doing the more valuable work ... I have seen her [Doreen, Harold's wife] in that sweltering heat, working in the office until far into the night and that after a long day which held no rest: this she sustains for months on end ... I was frequently told by the inhabitants that Mrs Ingrams' Arabic was even better than her husband's; and the respect and affection she has evidently gained both from men and women makes her a power in the land which the country may well be proud to possess.'

In 1940 the medal was awarded to Colonel F. G. Peake 'Pasha', also for services in Trans-Jordan, where he had established the Arab Legion. Peake had been Glubb's Commanding Officer and because of this it was felt necessary to leave a gap between the two awards and wait for Peake's retirement and return to England in 1939.

In 1938 Council decided to offer the Royal Air Force a replica of the medal both as a token of gratitude for the sum of money collected by all ranks and to commemorate Lawrence's time in the ranks of the service as Aircraftman Ross, later Shaw. The Air Ministry welcomed the idea. On 29 July 1939 Sir Percy Sykes, as senior Honorary Secretary, presented the medal at a parade of Cranwell cadets, taken by Lord Gort, Chief of the Imperial General Staff. In his speech Sir Percy said: 'The medal is instituted to keep alive the memory of that truly heroic officer, who described the conquest of the air as "the biggest thing to do in the world today"... May I express the hope that the medal may, in the not distant future, be awarded to a member of the Royal Air Force.' The medal continued to be displayed in the senior cadets' mess at Cranwell until the 1970s when it was moved to the Royal Air Force Museum storage depot at Stafford. In August 2000 an official of the museum said that it would be displayed at a proposed medal room in Hendon when a planned extension to the museum was built there.

There is insufficient space here to list in detail the achievements of all the medal winners. A survey of their endeavours would constitute a book in itself; indeed many have been written by or about them. They include anthropologists turned war-time tribe raisers, explorers, administrators, mountaineers, archaeologists, missionaries, soldiers, physicians, journalists, scholars, botanists and an etymologist. A roll is appended at the end of this chapter. Suffice it that here we should give more detail to the few who may be less well known.

During the Second World War the medal was awarded to some especially deserving and interesting recipients. In 1941 it was given to Captain C. E. Corry for his work in pacifying the tribesmen in the Muntafiq Liwa, the Iraq marshes, which cleared the way for Allied military operations in the area. Corry spent thirty years in Iraq, mostly in the police. The award followed closely upon the publication of his book The Blood Feud about his experiences in the Muntafiq.

In 1942 the recipient was Miss Mildred Cable, that remarkable lady who, in the 1920s, went out to work with the China Inland Mission with two equally remarkable sisters, the Misses Francesca and Evangeline French. During fifteen years they crossed the desert five times, often in primitive Chinese wooden carts, 'with Bible in hand, wearing Chinese clothes and speaking Turki'. In his Annual Dinner speech in 1934 Lord Lloyd had bracketed these achievements with Philby's crossing of the Empty Quarter. Between the three they gave ninety-eight years service 'to the business of the Kingdom of God'. In addition they acquired a great deal of scientific and other information, recorded in meticulous detail, that was useful to scientists and geographers. In his tribute to Miss

Mildred Cable (centre) and the French sisters

'... often in primitive Chinese wooden carts...'

Cable, after her death in 1952, the President, Sir John Shea, concluded: 'If you got to know her you would have found three things: a quiet sense of humour, an unmistakable aura of goodness and a faith such as can move mountains.' In 1944, after her return to England, she was welcomed as a Member of Council of the Society, which had been imaginative enough to give this award to a woman of peace at the height of war.

Miss Cable was followed in 1943 by, conversely, a man of war, Brigadier Orde Wingate, for his part in the Chindit campaign. Coincidentally, Wingate was a distant relative of Lawrence and on his death in March 1944 Field Marshal Wavell, writing his obituary in the Society's Journal, compared the two men: 'Both had high-powered minds which seemed unable to run in any but top gear however rough the going. . . In their theories of irregular warfare Lawrence was the amateur. Wingate had a professional background . . . But Lawrence, as I knew him, was certainly more restful and had a sense of humour which I never found in Wingate . . . Both were men of remarkable power and genius.'

In 1945 the medal was given to another extraordinary and little-known woman, Miss Ursula Graham Bower. Her recommendation came from Lieut General Slim, GOC of the 14th Army in Burma. In 1938 Miss Bower had gone to the Manipur area of North East Assam as an anthropologist, living with Nzemi Naga tribesmen, traditional head-hunters. Few Europeans had made contact previously and none won their confidence, which through sympathy and simple medical treatment she did. She secured a peace between the Nzemi and their blood enemies the Kuki. In November 1943 when the Japanese threat to Assam became real, using these tribesmen she organised a 'Watch and Ward' scheme which provided valuable intelligence to the military. In April 1944, when the Japanese had penetrated to within a day's march from her headquarters, despite being pressed by the army, she refused to move back. A supporting recommendation from Mr J. P. Mills, Adviser for Tribal Affairs, Assam, added: 'Living alone among head-hunters who were, at the time, at war with the British Government and to whom her scalp was particularly vulnerable, she successfully armed them in order to fight for the British against the Japanese at the extreme risk of their own lives.' The Commissioner of Kohima, in his own support, told how after he had despatched a number of shotguns to Miss Bower he got up one morning to find seven heads neatly laid out at his door 'to show what her tribesmen could do'.

In her letter of acceptance, written from the North Cachar Hills where, as Mrs Betts, she was now married to the local Political Officer, she wrote: 'Had it not been for the help and encouragement the Society gave me in 1938 [when she first became a member] I would never have gone to Assam in the first place.' This provides a good example of the way the Society has influenced many young people to pursue a career in Asia.

In the immediate post-war years Council became concerned about the difficulty of finding suitable candidates for the medal. In January 1946 it circulated a 'Private and Confidential' letter to various Commanders-in-Chief, Ambassadors and heads of institutes asking for suggestions. Assam was still in the news and in 1947 Council responded to recommendations from two successive Governors of that province that the medal should be given to Mr Charles Pawsey, who had been Deputy Commissioner of the Naga Hills during the last ten years. Similar to Miss Bower, but operating from a more secure base, he had been instrumental in persuading a primitive people to lay aside their blood feuds, adopt new methods of agriculture and, during the war, to adhere to the Allied cause, sharing with them the Siege of Kohima.

ROYAL MINT.
LONDON, E.C.3.

23rd May, 1945.

Dear Sir,

Thank you for your letter of the 17th May asking for the cost of Lawrence Memorial medals "struck in the proper way".

As this medal has never been a struck medal, I think it would be as well at this stage, to put on record the actual history of the production of the medal:- Plaster casts were supplied to the Mint by Mr. Kennington in February 1936, from these, relief nickel electrotypes (which are undamaged) were made. The relief of the medal was too high to give a satisfactory result by striking from steel dies in the usual way and and it was, therefore, agreed with Mr. Kennington that the first medal should be produced by direct reduction of the two sides in solid silver. The two sides were turned to size, and silver soldered together to form the medal, which was subsequently engraved on the rim "Founded by the Royal Central Asian Society of 1935". From this original medal, solid copper masters were grown in the electrotyping bath, for use as matrices in the production of the medals supplied to you between 1936 and 1943. These are solid silver electrotypes silver soldered together. It is these matrices which were destroyed by enemy action, and the medals supplied to you in 1943, were silver plated copper electrotypes, grown in gutta percha moulds obtained from a sample medal in our possession. To replace the destroyed copper matrices, we propose to use our sample medal, but before doing so we should like to compare it with your original.

Provided that our sample medal is perfect, the new copper matrices will produce silver medals exactly similar to those you have already had.

If it is not, we shall have to go back to the electrotypes. The cost of reproducing the destroyed matrices will not be charged for.

The present day cost of these silver medals will be £6.6.0. each plus the equivalent of purchase tax.

Yours faithfully, for Superintendent.

Letter from the Royal Mint explaining the history of the Lawrence Medal

Meanwhile, the Royal Mint was having war problems of its own which had affected the production of the actual medal. Enemy action had damaged the matrices from which the medals were made. Because of this, during the war the Mint had produced a cheaper 'token medal' which was given to war-time recipients with a certificate saying that true medals would be substituted later. By 1945 the matrices had been repaired and the original medals could be made again.

The 1949 medal winner was surely one of the most deserving and truly fitted the terms of the award 'or when a primitive people have been helped to a better way of life'. He was Sir Henry Tristram Holland, who arrived in Baluchistan as a member of the Church Missionary Society's (CMS) medical mission in 1900. He had soon gained the respect and affection of Pathans, Baluch, Brahuis and Hindus alike, enabling him to make long treks into tribal territory where he might well have become a victim of the knife of a religious fanatic. Perhaps his best memorial is the CMS-built hospital in Quetta, which he helped restore after the earthquake in 1935, when he and his wife narrowly escaped death in the resulting rubble. An acquaintance recalled how 'alongside that modern hospital at Quetta was a caravanserai, in the middle of which you would see mules and donkeys tethered and a goat being milked, and families living and cooking their food in their own primitive way. These people had come thousands of miles from across the Oxus from Bokhara and Samarkand, because they had heard of his work.' He was equally known and loved in Upper Sind, where he ran an eye clinic at Shikarpur, and in other towns of the plains. At his prime Holland was famed as one of the foremost eye specialists in the world, sometimes performing as many as two thousand cataract operations on a single tour. In his time he would have given sight to some 100,000 people. On presenting the medal at the Society's annual dinner in October 1949 the President, Viscount Wavell, said: 'I can only say that the Lawrence of Arabia medal has never been better earned.'

Sir Henry Holland

The winner in 1950, Lieut Colonel Frederick Spencer Chapman, mountaineer and soldier, is perhaps better known through his books. Lhasa the Holy City describes his 1936–1937 expedition to Tibet and The Jungle is Neutral his wartime experiences behind Japanese lines. In his recommendation Viscount Wavell wrote: 'Colonel Chapman has not Lawrence's literary genius, nor his introspection. He has never received the publicity and fame that were his predecessor's lot. But for sheer courage and endurance, physical and mental, the two men stand together.'

Many of the more recent award winners are better known today than those we have quoted, none more so than the two great mountaineers Sir John Hunt and Sir Christian Bonington. Some have been mentioned at greater length elsewhere in this work. The majority saw service in Arab countries. For example, the explorer Sir Wilfred Thesiger, at the time of writing an Honorary Vice President of the Society; Mrs Violet Dickson who, with her husband Colonel H. R. P. Dickson, spent decades in Kuwait; Brigadier Stephen Longrigg, both a political and oil company representative in Iraq; Nevill Barbour, a journalist covering Arab affairs, who strongly supported the Palestinian cause; and Sir Charles Belgrave whose name is almost synonymous with Bahrain and who in his acceptance speech was able to quote some personal memories of Lawrence.

Dear Sir Percy,

Many thanks for your note and for getting Miss Wigate to send
Gen. Shin's citation. Obviously Miss
Cohen-Bowers is a very remarkable person, as should make herself felt in a larger sphere of activity.

I shall do my best to attend the Medal Committee, whenever it is held. Last time I missed it as a result of being told to come at the wrong time.
I should like too to tell you of an idea of mine about Persepolis & the Greeks.

I hope all goes well with you &

yours.

Yours sincerely
Arnold Laurence

Dear Madam

Thank you very much for letting me know of the award of the Laurence Medal. I am sure my brother would have been very pleased that it has been given for work and travel amongst the tribes.

Yours sincerely
Montagu R. Laurence.

Sir Hugh Boustead was one of the Society's most colourful characters, and certainly the only one to have received a Royal Pardon for desertion. So determined was he to see active service on land, he jumped his Royal Navy ship off the Cape Station and then joined the South African Cavalry Brigade in an assumed name as a private soldier. He served subsequently on the Western Front where he was commissioned in the field and awarded the Military Cross, the first of many decorations. After early post-First World War service in Southern Russia and a crowded fifty years in Arab countries he left his heart in Arabia, literally: his ashes were scattered over the desert there. Sir Max Mallowan, husband of the novelist Agatha Christie, ran archaeological excavations in Iraq. Similarly, Professor Seton Lloyd, who, in his acceptance speech mentioned that whilst he had never met Lawrence himself, he had heard stories about him from Leonard Woolley, the archaeologist who supervised Lawrence at the Carchemish excavation between 1912 and 1914. Professor Serjeant was an Arabist and Islamic scholar of high standing and Elizabeth Monroe a writer on Arab affairs and Philby's biographer.

Colonel Sir Hugh Boustead

The award to the journalist Sandy Gall in 1986 is a fitting link to the Society's inexhaustible interest in Afghanistan. A century earlier service in that country would have provided many a medal winner. George Popov, who received the medal in 1995 is, like Ursula Bower, an example of an unsung hero. He spent fifty years in locust control work in Iran, the sub-continent, Arabia and Africa. He has been described as the least known but greatest scientific traveller of his time.

Lawrence's two brothers, Professor Arnold and Dr Montagu, while alive, took a great interest in the medal and would where possible be present at the award ceremonies, especially when they were connected with the Arab world.

The Lawrence Medal is a facet of the Society that has always attracted outside interest, especially from the younger generation. The words of that letter to The Times quoted at the start of the chapter – 'It is fitting that this memorial should encourage like, if lesser, achievement in an increasingly standardised and safety-first age' – are more pertinent than ever sixty-five years later. It would be a sad day if Council could no longer find candidates to satisfy the medal's original terms of reference, but as Sir William Dickson said, 'This Society will always recognise endeavour.' Sir Olaf Caroe, then one of the few surviving great pro-consuls of the former British Indian Empire and highly decorated by the government after thirty years service with the ICS, on receiving the medal himself in 1973 took a different perspective: 'An honour from one's peers is more valuable than any from the establishment.'

THE SIR PERCY SYKES MEMORIAL MEDAL AND OTHER SOCIETY AWARDS

We present this medal to the Society in the hope . . . that in its small way it may contribute to a better understanding and better fellowship between the peoples of this world.

Frank Sykes presenting the Sir Percy Sykes Memorial Medal to the Society, 24 March 1948

There can be few members who have given more to the Society than Brigadier General Sir Percy Molesworth Sykes, KCIE, CB, CMG. Or few who have absorbed more of the wisdom and history of Asia throughout a long and varied career there; twenty-one of his thirty active years were spent in Persia.

Commissioned in 1888 into the 16th Lancers based in India, he transferred forthwith to the 2nd Dragoon Guards (Queen's Bays) and subsequently to the Indian Political Service. He was sent on his first intelligence mission to Central Asia in 1892, aged only twenty-five, inter alia to report on the Transcaspian Railway. His second, the following year, entailed a six-month ride through Persia under cover of rejoining his regiment in India. This was the start of a love affair with that country which remained to the end of his life.

In 1894 Sykes was sent to Kerman to open the first British Consulate there. He was accompanied by his sister, Ella, who kept house for him. From this base he was sent on a variety of missions throughout South East Persia, which included the opening of a Consulate in Seistan ahead of the Russians. At the end of 1900, in his only major diversion from Asia, he became involved briefly in the Boer War in South Africa when he was wounded in the leg. During twelve months leave in England he published his first book, Ten Thousand Miles in Persia, and married Evelyn, daughter of Colonel Bruce Seton.

In early 1903, accompanied by his wife, he returned to his Consular post in Kerman. After two years he was transferred to Meshed as Consul General, both undertaking a 700-mile desert journey with their twenty-month-old first son, Frank, to get there. Lady Sykes has left a memorable account of this epic ride, their subsequent eight years in Meshed and various overland travels back to England on leave with a growing family. They left Meshed for good in November 1913. After two years in Europe, during which his two-volume work A History of Persia appeared in the spring of 1915, he was sent to Kashgar as temporary Consul General to cover the home leave of Sir George Macartney. He again took his sister Ella as housekeeper. In that year he was knighted.

In 1916 Sykes was sent back to Southern Persia in an attempt to retrieve a dangerous situation when law and order had collapsed and German agents were active in fomenting sedition. With the temporary rank of Brigadier General he raised a force of 8,000 locals, named the South Persia Rifles, to take the place of the unreliable gendarmerie. Recalled to London at the end of 1918, Sykes was retired at the early age of fifty-two and devoted the rest of his life to writing books and articles, mostly on Asian topics. At the start of the Second World War he was employed by the War Office to give lectures to recruits in order to stimulate their interest in the East.

British Consulate, Meshed [RSAA Archives]

Sykes's active life was one of considerable achievement. His years in Meshed covered the fall-out from the controversial Anglo-Russian Convention of 1907. With skill he fostered relations with the local government, thus hindering Russian attempts to use the area as a launch-pad into India. For this he received commendation from both Curzon and Lord Salisbury. For his mapping of little-known areas of south-east Persia he was awarded the Gold Medal of the Royal Geographical Society. Inevitably he had his critics, some of whom accused him of having no sense of humour and a naïve egotism. He died suddenly on 11 June 1945 aged seventy-eight the result of a heart attack while crossing Trafalgar Square on his way to the Athenaeum.

A current member, Colonel W. G. Neilson, recalls his uncle as 'a typically bluff Victorian, rotund, shortish and moustached. I remember how in the mid-1930s he took me out from school on my birthday. We went to the Royal Tournament at Olympia when he gave me signed copies of all three volumes of his Story of Exploration. Some years after his death Aunt Evelyn [Lady Sykes], who retained a sharp enthusiasm for keeping abreast of political events, persuaded me to join the Society.'

Sykes himself joined the Society in 1907 and became its Honorary Secretary in 1932, continuing to hold that office until one month before his death. He was a prolific lecturer and contributor to the Journal; this was especially valuable during the Second World War when lecturers were hard to find. He gave his last talk only weeks before he died.

His sister, Miss Ella Sykes, who pre-deceased him, was one of the original members of the Society. She shared many of his Asian travels and was an authority on Persia in her own right.

Sir Percy was prodigious not only in his literary output, but also in his progeny: four sons and two daughters. One of the sons, Edward, followed in his father's Persian footsteps. A civilian, working as an accountant with various engineering firms in Iran, during the Second World War he was recruited by the Special Operations Executive. As 'cover' he served in a number of Vice Consular posts to prepare for what, at the time, appeared a German threat to that country via the Caucasus. He joined the Society in 1935. Frank, the eldest brother, joined in 1946. A cousin, Major Herbert Sykes, who had also travelled in Persia, joined in 1904.

One of Sir Percy's daughters, Elinor, married J. F. 'Sinbad' Sinclair, a senior executive of Burmah-Shell in India and himself a member of the Society. With her help Sinclair assiduously cultivated and employed Indians, making the company's eventual nationalisation a success. The other daughter, Rachel, married Sir Patrick Reilly, also a member, who rose to be ambassador in both Moscow and Paris.

With that background it is hardly surprising that upon Sir Percy's death the family decided to initiate a medal in his memory. Unlike the Lawrence Medal, where funds for its endowment were collected by public subscription, the Sykes family provided the necessary capital to set up a Trust Deed. The initial funds of £360 covered the artist's fees, manufacture of dies by the Royal Mint and the cost of the first two medals. From this sum £150 was invested, which it was vainly hoped might provide an income to cover both the cost and engraving of future medals.

The terms of reference for the medal were different from those of the Lawrence award, there being greater emphasis on research and letters, rather than exploration with risk, and nationality was not confined to British subjects:

The Percy Molesworth Sykes Memorial Medal is open to persons of any nationality who have distinguished themselves in travel, archaeology, research or letters connected with Iran or other countries within the orbit of the Royal Central Asian Society. The medal may also be awarded for outstanding work in furthering cultural relations between the British Empire and any of those countries. The medal may be awarded annually should a suitable candidate be forthcoming. The award will be made by the Council of the Royal Central Asian Society.

Although not specifically written into the terms, the Sykes family had made clear their wish that in view of Sir Percy's first love being Iran, men and women connected with that country should be considered especially. However, they accepted that nominations lay entirely with Council.

Like the Lawrence Medal, the artist Eric Kennington was asked to design it. He again approached his task with enthusiasm, mentioning progress in letters to the Society's Secretary. 'For the portrait I visited the Sykes family and Lady Sykes passed the head as like Sir Percy. She knew it would not be very like and was pleasantly surprised. She said "it's got the spirit more than the likeness and that's much more important" ... The Deputy Master of the Mint said he got more enjoyment from it than from all the Victory medals sent in to him.' The medal bears on one side the portrait of Sir Percy and on its verso a design of Marco Polo dictating his great work and the legend 'What thou seest write in a book'. The formal presentation of the medal to the Society was made by the Sykes family on 24 March 1948.

As with the Lawrence Medal a sub-committee was formed to nominate to Council their recommendations for the award. It included initially Edward Sykes, when he was in England, otherwise his brother Frank. The Editor of The Times Literary Supplement was also asked for his ideas about recipients.

The first nomination was made in 1947 to a Persian academic, Monsieur Mohammed Fakhri Dai Gilani, an historian long engaged in interpreting Western thought to his own countrymen. It was presented to him in Teheran by Edward Sykes, then working there.

A roll of awardees is appended and it may be noted that a fair percentage have been involved in activity in Iran, thus meeting the wish of the Sykes family. Sir Percy would have known personally several of the early recipients, especially Sir Reader Bullard, who was ambassador in Teheran during the war and who, rather unkindly, and perhaps not too seriously, dubbed Sykes's great book on Persia as 'dreadful'. Sykes would have felt a common bond with others, who, like himself, were travellers and authors.

Whenever possible members of the Sykes family would be present at the award-giving ceremonies, usually the Society's Annual Dinner. Even as late as 1987, when the award was made to Professor Beckingham by the Society's then Patron, the Prince of Wales, both Mr Edward Sykes and Mrs Elinor Sinclair were present. In 1992 when it was awarded to Mr Albert Hourani (his wife receiving it due to Hourani's recent premature death) three members of the extended family, Mrs Elinor Sinclair, Sir Patrick Reilly and Mr Richard Sykes, were all present, Edward having died the previous year. In 2001 when the beneficiary was Mr Mark Tully, Sir Percy's grandson, Mr Mark Sinclair attended. When a recipient was too ill to attend a public ceremony, or travel to London, the medal was given in private by the President or Chairman of the Society, or the local British ambassador.

As was the case with the Lawrence Medal, income from the original endowment soon proved insufficient to cover the rapidly rising cost of replacement medals made by the Royal Mint. The medals were made of 92.5 per cent silver with the remainder copper, the amalgam being known as 'fine silver'. Their cost to the Society was based on the current price of silver when manufactured. In the case of the Sykes medal the full amount rose from £2/13/4 in 1946 to £156.65 in 2001. In February 1979 Mr Edward Sykes agreed that the family would meet the cost of new medals in order to perpetuate the award, a policy re-iterated by Sir Patrick Reilly in 1992 and Mr Mark Sinclair in 2001.

The Royal Mint valued its links with the Society and took an interest in its medals. In April 1951 it displayed both the Lawrence and Sykes Medals in its pavilion at the South Bank Exhibition.

Re-examination of the Society's Medal Policy

In early 1975 Council decided to re-examine the whole basis on which awards of the Society's two medals were made. This initiative was prompted by the changing nature of the Society and its membership; that is from one where members had spent an active career in Asia during the imperial era, to one of increasing commercial, cultural and academic interests after that period. The rising costs of the medals themselves had become another consideration. Dr Malcolm Yapp, a member of Council, was asked to make a specific study and he gave his report in October. On the subject of finance he pointed out that the cost of future medals was likely to be in excess of £40; if the medals were awarded less frequently there could be a saving. An alternative would be to scrap both medals and create a specific Society medal, but the charge for a new design and new dies would be expensive.

From his study of the awardees of the Lawrence and Sykes Medals, Dr Yapp concluded that the Society had moved away from a policy of rewarding the man of action towards the academic. 'A continuation of this tendency would mean that awards of the Lawrence medal would become still less frequent while it would become increasingly difficult to distinguish the Sykes Medal from those awarded by other Societies. . . . One way in which the Society could demonstrate its independent valuable role and further its aims would be by honouring neither the active official nor the pure scholar but primarily the great intermediary, the man or woman who enlarges the general understanding of the countries and peoples of modern Asia.' Yapp recommended that the Lawrence of Arabia Medal should not be awarded in the future; that the Sykes Medal should be awarded under the existing terms but widened to include 'anyone who is deemed to have made a substantial contribution to the wider knowledge and understanding of Asia' and that consideration be given to the implications of altering the description of the Sykes Medal so as to make it known primarily as 'The Medal of the Royal Society for Asian Affairs'.

Council decided to take no further action until the matter had been aired widely. Not unnaturally, Dr Yapp's report created a stir among the Society's more conservative members. Sir Olaf Caroe (himself a holder of the Lawrence Medal) wrote in April of the following year: 'To close down one or other of these awards would reduce its value ... and be regarded sadly by any decrees who are still alive. It would even reflect on the dead "Oh yes, I remember he was awarded that medal, but of course it no longer exists"... I think how sad would be Toker, Bell, Henry Holland, Charles Belgrave, Bill Allen to mention no others ... It may be wise, and certainly courteous, to consult any of the living heirs of those mainly responsible for the institution of each medal. [T. E. Lawrence's executor, his brother, Professor Arnold Lawrence, was still alive, as were several immediate members of the Sykes family.] And it is arguable that our Society gains in prestige by being the authority awarding these medals.'

Sir Olaf continued: 'Which of the two medals is the more prestigious? ... Lawrence is far more an historical name and I would say Lawrence. Sykes gets confused with Mark Sykes – though Lawrence with Henry and John, who did their duty! ... It would only be necessary to decide this if Dr Yapp's proposal to merge the awards were adopted and replaced by a single medal known as the RSAA medal ... unconnected with the name of Lawrence, Sykes or anybody else. If one wanted a name perhaps that of Curzon, our first President, would be as good as any. He is likely to go down in history long after Lawrence and Sykes are forgotten.' When considering the problem of cost Sir Olaf felt that the Society could meet the increase if each medal was to be awarded in alternate years. 'If we can, the easiest course is to go on as we are and do nothing save perhaps to revise the terms of the award in each case.' He concluded: 'I would just add that it will be a great pity if awards are made solely by literary, scholastic or academic worth. Exploration, diplomacy, commercial, artistic, missionary endeavours and other active fields should be included. And what about Asians themselves.' Sir Olaf's views were endorsed by the previous Chairman, Sir Norman Brain, who was keen that nothing should be done to depreciate the value of the medals.

The Secretary, forwarding Caroe's and Brain's letters to both the Society's Chairman and President, added some comments of her own. 'There will be very considerable feeling amongst members if the medals are dropped. They are a source of publicity for the Society, were designed by Eric Kennington and have been exhibited on various occasions. Some of our younger members became interested in the Society through reading about the medals.'

After debating the issue Council decided that both medals should be awarded less frequently and only on outstanding merit; that reference to the British Empire should be omitted from the Lawrence Medal; nominations should be sought on a wider scale, e.g. through Heads of Diplomatic Missions, and with the exception of the above, the awards should be continued as previously. These issues settled, there was no further disturbance to the award pattern, though the Lawrence Medal in particular was given less frequently, there being at times five- to eight-year gaps.

The Royal Society for Asian Affairs Special Award

In 1998 it was decided to augment the two standing medals with an additional award, though not a medal as such. This was to be known as the Royal Society for Asian Affairs Special Award:

The award shall be made in recognition of exceptionally outstanding and unusual achievement in Asia, or any part of it or in connection with Asia. The achievement may be in any sphere, including service to humanity, contribution to science, the extension of knowledge, innovation, individual ingenuity and resource, personal effort and courage, endurance, fortitude or contribution to culture. The award is intended to supplement the categories of person who may be honoured by the Society by the award of the Sir Percy Sykes Memorial Medal or the Lawrence of Arabia Medal and should not exclude anyone who might also be considered for the award of one of these medals. The award shall be presented by the President of the Society.

The first recipient, in 1998, was an American, Mr Peter McMillan. In 1994 he had re-enacted the historic flight made from Britain to Australia in 1919 by Captain Ross Smith, who had been personal pilot to T. E. Lawrence during the Arab Revolt, and his brother Lieutenant Keith Smith. The flight was made in a replica of the Vickers Vimy FB 27A bomber aircraft which had been used for the original journey and along a similar route. It entailed many difficulties and hazards which McMillan had detailed to the Society in an illustrated lecture the previous year.

The second award was made to Dr Ina Russell in 1999 for long service to the Society both as a Member of Council and as an Honorary Secretary. She played a specific part in forwarding the Society's educational role.

The two medals, and the new award, are an important aspect of the Society; many outsiders have only heard of it through them. Further, they are a factor in recruitment. As we concluded in the previous chapter, it would be a sad day if Council could no longer find candidates to fulfil their terms of reference. Some may argue that the age of seminal exploration, geographic or academic, is over. This seems a negative approach; repeated fresh endeavours have proved otherwise, and the medals act as a spur for such continuance.

When the artist Eric Kennington was in the midst of designing the Sykes medal he wrote to the Secretary, 'Yes, we all fade out but the Royal Central Asian Society will go on and I hope its medals also.' May it be so.

EPILOGUE

Perhaps few of the Society's Founders could have foreseen that just one hundred years after its inception Central Asia would again become an important element in world politics. The collapse of the Soviet Union and the concomitant independence of its former Central Asian Republics in 1991 have created a new battleground between regional states and the West for the exploitation of the area's energy reserves. Some have described this as a 'New Great Game'. Similarly, within the Muslim world itself there has been competition to influence the re-awakening of an Islamic identity in those countries.

However, there is an especial irony that in the very month, October 2001, that the Society celebrated its centennial founding, Central Asia in general and Afghanistan in particular became the focus of the world's attention. Even Curzon could scarcely have seen the prophetic nature of his remark in 1908: 'If the Central Asian Society exists and is meeting in fifty or a hundred years time, Afghanistan will be as vital and important a question as it is now.' As the reader will have seen, there have been more lectures on Afghanistan in the hundred years of the Society's existence than on any other subject; two more were already scheduled for the close of 2001.

Islam, likewise, long a subject of interest and debate in the Society, has returned as one of topical importance, not only in Asia but in the West also.

Finally, we can reflect once more on Younghusband's words of 1910: 'It is not sound business to be continually at the mercy of events . . . Events can be largely foreseen and if troubles are coming they can be provided for by those who know the countries and their peoples.' There seems a greater need than ever for those with first-hand knowledge and experience to be at the helm of advice. The dictum is timeless and will be drawn on equally by the chronicler of the Society's Bi-centennial History, still instancing members with such expertise.

NOTES

I GENESIS, BIRTH AND CONSOLIDATION 1901-1907

- 1 Jardine later presented the Society with the striking effigy of the Maharajah of Orchehaha which is displayed in the Society's offices.
- 2 Lynch, later a member of Parliament, was senior partner in the Lynch commercial empire which ran steam navigation services along the Tigris and Euphrates rivers and at Muhammarah (Khorramshahr) in the Persian Gulf.
- 3 Tournament of Shadows, Karle E. Meyer and Shareen Blair Brysac, Counterpoint, Washington, 1999, p. 295.
- 4 Titles include: The Heart of a Continent; Wonders of the Himalaya; Everest the Challenge; The Reign of God; and Adventure of Faith.
- 5 Titles include: The Indian Civil Service and the Competitive System; Statistics of the North West Provinces of India; The International Monetary Conference in Paris and Bimetallism; Lectures and Papers on the Silver Question; and Early Proceedings of the Bimetallic League.
- 6 The Society's interest in Egypt extended beyond Islam. In 1930 Professor K. A. Creswell was made an Honorary Member for his work on Muslim art and architecture in that country, later being awarded the Sir Percy Sykes Medal. And in 1948 Mrs R. Devonshire was elected an Honorary Member in recognition of her work on the antiquities of Egypt.
- 7 Sir Alfred Lyall and the Understanding with Russia, Sir H. Mortimer Durand, Journal, 1914, p. 20.
- 8 Oriental and India Office Collection, British Library (F/197/241).
- 9 Concluding remarks by Colonel Sir Thomas Holdich in Life in Russian Turkestan and Germany's Menace to India, Annette Meakin, Journal, 1919, p. 3.

II THE YEARS OF STRUGGLE 1908-1919

- 1 Chinese Affairs, Eugene Ch'en, Proceedings of the Central Asian Society, 1913.
- 2 China, J. O. P. Bland, Journal, 1919, p. 38.
- 3 The Society was represented by Sir Percy Sykes, Honorary Secretary, at the unveiling of a memorial tablet to Sir Mortimer Durand on 26 August 1937 at Penmayne House, Rock, Cornwall, where Sir Mortimer lived from 1915 until his death in 1924. Sykes was also Mortimer's biographer.
- 4 Military Mission to N.W. Persia, 1918, General Dunsterville, Journal, 1921, p. 79 and Adventures of Dunsterforce, London, 1920.
- 5 The British Military Mission to Turkistan, General Malleon, Journal, 1922, p. 96. Other members of the Society who served in this mission not mentioned here included Lieut Colonel E. A. F. Redl, Colonel C. B. Stokes and Colonel J. K. Tod. A proposed lecture to the Society by Stokes was vetoed by the Foreign Office.
- 6 Caspian Naval Expedition, 1918-1919, Captain David Norris, Journal, 1923, p. 216.
- 7 In Russian Turkistan under the Bolsheviks, Major F. M. Bailey, Journal, 1921, p. 49, and Mission to Tashkent, London, 1946. A more detailed account of Bailey's adventures is given in Chapter VI.
- 8 Military Operations in Transcaspia, Lieut Colonel D. E. Knollys, Journal, 1926, p. 89.

- 9 The Transcaspian Episode, 1918–1919, Colonel C. H. Ellis, Journal, 1959, p. 106, and his book of the same title, London, 1963. There were further accounts by others published in the Journal and elsewhere.
- 10 On Secret Service East of Constantinople, Peter Hopkirk, London, 1994, pp. 360–361.
- 11 The most compelling account of the fate of the twenty-six commissars is given in Oil and Blood in the Orient, ‘Essad Bey’ (Lev Nussimbaum), Berlin; translated London, 1931.

III FROM LEAN YEARS TO GOLDEN YEARS 1920–1939

- 1 By a coincidence this bowl recently came into the possession of Sir Nicholas Goodison, the Chairman of one of the Society’s Corporate members.
- 2 Sir Maurice de Bunsen, a former diplomat, had served in Japan, Siam and Turkey. He was Ambassador in Vienna at the outbreak of war in 1914, and chaired the committee set up in 1915 to review British objectives in Asiatic Turkey.
- 3 E. M. Gull’s vivid account of his visit to Mongolia was published in the Journal in 1914. He continued as Honorary Secretary until 1942, serving concurrently as Secretary to the China Association.
- 4 O’Dwyer’s assassination at a Society meeting in 1940 is discussed in Chapter IV.
- 5 Among the Society’s senior office holders up to this period five – Younghusband, Holdich, Ronaldshay, Curzon and Chetwode – had also held the office of President of the Royal Geographical Society, as did later, Sir Gilbert Laithwaite, who was the Society’s Chairman from 1964 to 1966. Two other prominent members of the Society were also RGS Presidents: Dr David Hogarth and Sir Percy Cox.
- 6 Professor Browne lectured the Society in 1908 on the Persian Constitutionalists. The meeting was attended by several banished members of the Persian assembly.
- 7 Lieut Colonel Cobb was visiting the Amban in connection with the opening of the Indian-Sinkiang-China postal service. A full description of how he came to be in possession of the head, one of three offered by the Amban, is given in Cobb’s entertaining paper Big Game Hunting on the Roof of the World, Journal, 1958, p. 115.
- 8 This ancient sect, which still uses Syriac for its liturgies, was originally characterised by its belief in the dual nature of Christ. It is named after the Patriarch of Constantinople, Bishop Nestorius, who, after being deposed at the Council of Ephesus in AD 431, was exiled. The sect spread through Syria, Persia, Arabia, Central Asia to China and even Southern India and in later centuries was the most extended in Christendom.
- 9 Our Smallest Ally: A Brief Account of the Assyrian Nation in the Great War, Revd W. A. Wigram DD, SPCK, 1920.
- 10 The Assyrians in Iraq: A Summary of their History from 1918–1933, Journal, 1934, p. 255.
- 11 There were, separately, other suggestions including British Guiana. None of these proposals seem to have taken into account that most of these Assyrians were a mountainous people only happy living in such terrain.
- 12 Captain G. Gracy, DSO, was employed as an Intelligence Officer during the campaign and became a Prisoner of War in Russia. After the War he was appointed Organizing Secretary of the Save the Children Fund.
- 13 The Nestorian community is now scattered around the world, both in the East and the West, with large numbers in the United States, the seat of the Patriarch. The Gulf War of 1999 caused a new diaspora with a number of Assyrians settling in Ealing, a development scarcely foreseen by Sir Percy Sykes.
- 14 Report on a Discussion on the Palestine Proposals, Discussion Group at the Society’s offices, Journal, 1939, p. 454.

IV FROM EMPIRE AND BACK TO TRADE 1940–1959

- 1 Mannerheim’s Ride to China, Matti Clinge, Journal, 1989, p. 142.
- 2 The Amritsar Legacy: Golden Temple to Caxton Hall. The Story of a Killing, Roger Perkins, Picton, 1989. Murder at Caxton Hall. The Society’s Involuntary Legacy to Amritsar, Hugh Leach, Journal, 1998.

- 3 Appropriately in 1928 Lloyd, as High Commissioner, had persuaded the Egyptian government to grant land in Cairo for the building of an English Cathedral.
- 4 Revolt in the Desert and With Lawrence in Arabia, book review by A. T. W. (Sir Arnold Wilson), Journal, 1927, p. 262.
- 5 There were at the half-way point in 1951, 383 (502) members giving overseas addresses, broken down as follows. Figures in parenthesis show comparative figures for 1939. In the Near East 128 (170); Indian sub-continent 32 (130); Central Asia, Russia and Iran 15 (40); Far East 9 (19); Africa 25 (18); United States and Canada 45 (35). The remainder were mostly given in European countries. The figures are not definitive as some members probably gave their addresses as care of their parent organisations in Britain. There were 105 (75) Asian members.

V SETTLING TO A BALANCE 1960–2001

- 1 The grace delivered with fierce intensity in a strong Scottish accent was usually beyond the understanding of visitors:

Some ha'e meat an' canna eat,
 An' some wad eat that want it,
 But we ha'e meat an' we can eat,
 An sae the Lord be thankit.
- 2 On retirement both Sir Esler Denning and Sir Norman Brain became Chairman of the Japan Society in London.
- 3 Review of Requirements of Diplomacy and Commerce for Asian and African Languages and Area Studies. Recast for the Society as Speaking for the Future: the Use and Teaching of Language, Peter Parker, Journal, 1987, p. 269.
- 4 Of the 196 overseas members 15 gave their addresses in China and Hong Kong, 11 elsewhere in the Far East; 3 in Central Asia and Mongolia; 11 in India, Nepal and Sri Lanka and 9 in Pakistan; 13 in Arabia and the Gulf, 7 elsewhere in the Near and Middle East; 2 in Iran; 3 in Africa; 4 in South America; 65 in the United States; 37 in Europe and 16 in Australia and New Zealand. There were 51 Asian members. These figures can be compared with those given for the end of the first half-century, quoted in notes to the previous chapter, when there were 383 overseas addresses.
- 5 The War in Yemen, Colonel Neil McLean, DSO, MP, Journal, 1964, p. 102.
- 6 Tribal Migration on the Irano-Afghan Border, André Singer, Journal, 1973, p. 160. Problems of Pastoralism in the Afghan Pamirs, André Singer, Journal, 1976, p. 156.
- 7 A Ride to Shiwa: A Source of the Oxus, Hugh Leach, Journal, 1986, p. 264.
- 8 A Traveller's Guide to Pakistan, Hilary Adamson and Isobel Shaw, Asian Study Group, Islamabad, 1981. Collins Illustrated Guide to Pakistan, Isobel Shaw, Collins, 1989. Pakistan Trekking Guide: Himalaya, Karakorum and Hindu Kush, Isobel Shaw and Ben Shaw, The Guidebook Co., Hong Kong, 1993. Pakistan Handbook, Isobel Shaw, John Murray, 1989; Moon Travel Handbooks, USA, 1998.
- 9 Her monographs on the inscriptions and monuments of Peshawar (1988, 1991), Quetta (1992) and Rawalpindi (1996) in Pakistan are published by BACSA. Also those on Chittagong (1999) and the Tea Garden Cemeteries of Sylhet, Bangladesh (2001) (with John A. Radford, OBE).
- 10 Lost Camels of Tartary, John Hare, Journal, 1997, p. 206. Loulan: A Journey of Exploration from the East, John Hare, Journal, 1999, p. 131.
- 11 China and the West: Recent Archaeological Research in South Asia, John Carswell, Journal, 1989, p. 37. A Month in Mongolia: Khorakhotu Revisited, John Carswell, Journal, 1998, p. 287. Westward from Mongolia: New Research in the Taklamakan, John Carswell, Journal, 2001, p. 117.
- 12 George Hayward: His Central Asian Explorations, His Murder, His Legacy, Charles Timmis, Journal, 1998, p. 161.
- 13 Prester John in Central Asia, Johnny Wyld, Journal, 2000, p. 3.
- 14 A Journey to the Sources of the Jaxartes, Hugh Leach, Journal, 1999, p. 269.

IX THE LIBRARY

- 1 Included were further books from Sir Percy Sykes; five from Lieut Colonel A. C. Yate, signed by their authors; Miss Gertrude Bell gave a copy of her own work From Amurath to Amurath and Sir Thomas Arnold of his on The Caliphate. Lord Curzon gave a collection including a copy of his own Tales of Travel.
- 2 Amongst these were: Voyage D'Orenbourg à Boukhara, Meyendorff, 1826; Travels in Koordistan and Mesopotamia, 2 vols, Fraser, 1840; Residence among the Nestorians, Perkins, 1843; Les Hommes Illustrés de l'Orient, 2 vols, Mazas, 1847; Histoire des Koordes, 2 vols, Zeinof, 1860; High Tartary, Yarkand and Kashgar, Shah, 1871; Report on a Mission to Yarkand, 2 vols, Forsyth, 1873; From Kulja to Tien Shan and Lop Nor, Prejevalsky, 1879, and Col. Grodekoff's Ride from Samarcand to Herat, Marvin, 1880. Also destroyed was the only extant set of the Society's bound journals and its five-volume Encyclopaedia of Islam.
- 3 Amongst those who replaced books destroyed by enemy action were Sir Percy Sykes, who provided another set of the Encyclopaedia of Islam; Major General Sir William Beynon, who donated a set of Journals and books on India; Miss Gertrude Patterson, including a rare 1836 book on Syria; Mr H. E. Goad and Mr W. B. Lane. As recently as 1999 Mrs Mary Mackay replaced the rare volume by Prejevalsky. And subsequent to the destruction the library has put together two complete bound sets of Journals.
- 4 Other gifts during this period included a collection of Turkish books and parts of the Turkish Encyclopaedia from Mr Iain Gordon Campbell; books from the library of Sir Louis Dane presented by his daughter and books on China from the estate of Sir Eric Teichman.

X THE ARCHIVES

- 1 OIOC MSS.Eur.F157-319, British Library: Bailey's typescript autobiography, p. 18.
- 2 See Bailey's Mission to Tashkent, Jonathan Cape, 1946.
- 3 Tibet and the British Raj, Alex McKay, Curzon, 1997, p. xxiii.
- 4 Elder brother of Sir Maurice Bowra, the renowned classical scholar and Warden of Wadham College, Oxford.
- 5 See Charles Drage's Servant of the Dragon Throne: Being the Lives of Edward and Cecil Bowra, Peter Dawnay, 1966.
- 6 Based on article, Seen in Kashgaria, John Shipman, Journal, 1998, pp. 54–59.
- 7 La Vallée des Rubis, Librairie Gallimard, 1955; English translation, Mogok: The Valley of Rubies, MacGibbon & Kee, 1960.
- 8 The late Lord Greenhill of Harrow was President of the Society 1977–1984.
- 9 Pathan Borderland (1910), was followed by Realm of the Gods (1915), A Burmese Enchantment (1916), A Burmese Loneliness (1918), A Burmese Wonderland (1922), and A Burmese Arcady (1923). His subsequent work included books on Ceylon (1927) and Malaya (1937).
- 10 I am indebted to Mr St John Armitage for contributing this note on the Lawrence sketch map.
- 11 Quoting letter from Carruthers to Professor A. W. Lawrence, 1935.
- 12 Lawrence's master copy – for several years in Hogarth's safe keeping – was sold by the Lawrence family to a private American collector in the 1970s and deposited in the Huntington Library, California. It was auctioned at Christies, New York, on 22 May 2001 for US Dollars 850,000.
- 13 See pp. 123–127 of The Gilgit Game, John Keay, John Murray, 1982.
- 14 Lady (Charlotte) MacGregor, who joined the Society in 1920, was his second wife; his first (Frances), who died in 1873, was the favourite sister of Sir Mortimer Durand, a future Chairman of the Society.

- 15 Major General Sir Charles MacGregor KCB, CSI, CIE, founded the United Service Institution of India (USI) in 1870. In 1888, it struck the MacGregor Memorial Medal in his memory. (See also Footnote 2 to Chapter XIV.)
- 16 Peaks and Plains of Central Asia (1933), Between the Oxus and Indus (1935), Unknown Karakoram (1936), and Kafirs and Glaciers (1938).
- 17 Schomberg declined an invitation to extend his visit, commenting 'guests are like fish, they stink after three days'!
- 18 Stein was greatly touched by Schomberg's tribute to him on the occasion of his eightieth birthday, published in the Journal, 1942, pp. 176–177.
- 19 The archive also includes five letters from Stein, written between 1930 and 1939 to Miss M. N. Kennedy, then Secretary of the Society. Oddly, there is no mention of Schomberg, nor of Stein's long-standing links with the Society, in either Jeanette Mirsky's biography of Stein (1977), or in Annabel Walker's (1995).
- 20 See also Dr Omar Shakespeare Pound's detailed commentary on the Shakespeare Papers in the Journal, Feb. 1991, pp. 121–124. Dr Pound's understanding that the collection was given to the Society by the Palestine Exploration Fund (PEF) cannot be corroborated, and probably arose from the fact that from 1947 to 1961 the Society shared premises with the PEF in Hinde Street, where the collection was held at that time. John Shakespeare, and his cousin Colonel L. W. Shakespeare (1860–1933) both joined the Society in 1920.
- 21 In her Fifty Years with John Company, John Murray, 1936, Ursula Low quotes extensively from Richmond Shakespeare's letters written while he was in Afghanistan in 1839 and 1842, and in Khiva and Russia in 1840. Her family were related to the Shakespears, and in the foreword to her book she warmly acknowledges John Shakespeare's help. There is a memorial tablet dedicated to Colonel Sir Richmond Campbell Shakespeare, KCB, with a moving inscription, in St Anne's Church, Indore.
- 22 For a brief account of John Shakespeare's exploits, see Lushai Chrysalis, Major A. G. McCall, Luzac & Co., 1949, pp. 54–64. Shakespeare's own book, The Lushai Kuki Clans, Macmillan, 1912, reflects his intimate knowledge of, and affection for, the hill people of the Assam borderlands. His cousin L. W. Shakespeare also served in, and wrote about, Assam.
- 23 Douglas Carruthers wrote an account of this remarkable but unpublished journey in the Geographical Journal, May 1922. The typescript bears a few pencilled annotations in his hand, which suggests that the document probably reached the Society through him.
- 24 I am indebted to Dr Jim Hoare, British Charge d'Affaires in Pyongyang, for identifying locations and landmarks, for distinguishing ethnic Koreans from Japanese, and for providing the historical background.
- 25 A. C. Tupp's signature is dated 1908. He delivered a lecture to the Society on French Indo-China in May 1906. The book may have been presented either before or after his death in 1914.

XI THE DINNER CLUB

- 1 Lady Evelyn Cobbold was the daughter of the 7th Earl of Dunmore, an original member of the Society. She converted to Islam in 1915, performing the pilgrimage in 1933, believed to have been the first English woman to have done so. She was helped in the Hejaz by another British Muslim member, Mr H. St J. B. Philby – 'Hajji Abdullah'. She published a book in 1933, the same year as her Dinner Club talk, Pilgrimage to Mecca (John Murray) which had a Foreword by another Muslim member, Sheikh Hafiz Wahba, the Saudi Arabian Minister in London. She sent a copy to the Society's Secretary, Miss Kennedy, inscribed 'In grateful recognition of all the help given'.

XIII THE TOURS

- 1 Two of them, Robin Poulton and his wife, subsequently wrote their doctoral theses on the anthropology of Tajik villages in Northern Afghanistan. In October 2001 Dr Robin Poulton wrote a Review Article for the Journal entitled The Kalashnikov in Afghanistan, Tajikistan and the other 'Stans', Journal, 2001, p. 295.
- 2 These two giant images of the Buddha were destroyed by the Taliban regime in Afghanistan in the spring of 2001.
- 3 Edward and Sarah Stallybrass, Robert Yuille and William Swann. The Society's member Professor Charles Bawden tells the story of this remarkable mission in Shamans, Lamas and Evangelicals. The English Missionaries in Siberia, Routledge & Kegan Paul, London, 1985.
- 4 Younghusband: The Last Great Imperial Adventurer, Patrick French, London, 1994.

XIV THE LAWRENCE OF ARABIA MEMORIAL MEDAL

- 1 Philby of Arabia, Elizabeth Monroe, Faber, 1973, p. 210.
- 2 The MacGregor Memorial Medal was instituted in 1888 by the United Service Institute of India (USI) for 'the best military reconnaissance of the year carried out by any officer or other rank belonging to the Indian Defence Establishment'. Several officers who became members of the Society were recipients. They included (ranks and decorations at the time of the award): Colonel M. S. Bell, VC, 1889; Captain Francis Younghusband, CIE, 1890; Captain A. W. S. Wingate, 1900; Major P. M. Sykes, 1910; Lieutenant A. T. Wilson, 1912; Captain F. M. Bailey, 1914; Captain E. W. C. Noel, CIE, DSO, 1918; Captain L. V. S. Blacker, 1920 and Colonel A. S. Lancaster, CIE, OBE, 1946, the only person to be awarded it twice, the first time in 1938. Major General Orde Wingate, DSO, was also a holder. (See Footnote 15, Chapter X.)

XV THE SIR PERCY SYKES MEMORIAL MEDAL AND OTHER SOCIETY AWARDS

- 1 I am grateful to Sir Denis Wright for sending me a copy of his paper Sir Percy Sykes and Persia published in Central Asian Survey, 1993, and to Colonel W. G. Neilson, Sir Percy's nephew, for the loan of a copy of Lady Sykes's personal memoirs, on both of which I drew for the short history of Sir Percy's life. I benefited also from conversations with the late Mrs Deborah Sykes, widow of Charles, Sir Percy's second son.
